

THE PALESTINE- ISRAEL CONFLICT

A Basic Introduction

GREGORY HARMS with TODD M. FERRY

“Superior and remarkably thorough. Strongly recommended” Choice

FOURTH EDITION

The Palestine–Israel Conflict

The Palestine–Israel Conflict

A Basic Introduction

Fourth Edition

Gregory Harms
with Todd M. Ferry

First published 2005
Fourth edition published 2017 by Pluto Press
345 Archway Road, London N6 5AA

www.plutobooks.com

Copyright © Gregory Harms and Todd M. Ferry 2005, 2008, 2012, 2017

The right of Gregory Harms and Todd M. Ferry to be identified as the authors of this work has been asserted by them in accordance with the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988.

British Library Cataloguing in Publication Data
A catalogue record for this book is available from the British Library

ISBN 978 0 7453 9927 0 Hardback
ISBN 978 0 7453 9926 3 Paperback
ISBN 978 1 7868 0113 5 PDF eBook
ISBN 978 1 7868 0115 9 Kindle eBook
ISBN 978 1 7868 0114 2 EPUB eBook

This book is printed on paper suitable for recycling and made from fully managed and sustained forest sources. Logging, pulping and manufacturing processes are expected to conform to the environmental standards of the country of origin.

Typeset by Stanford DTP Services, Northampton, England

Simultaneously printed in the United Kingdom and United States of America for my brother, Jason

Contents

List of Maps

Acknowledgments

Preface to the Fourth Edition

Introduction

Part I: Regional History

- 1 Canaan–Palestine: Ancient History by Todd M. Ferry
- 2 Muhammad, Islam, and the Arab Empire
- 3 The Crusades to the Ottoman Empire

Part II: Origins

- 4 Jewish Persecution and Zionism
- 5 Palestine
- 6 The Genesis of Conflict: Across Two World Wars

Part III: Conflict

- 7 Partition, Israeli Statehood, and the Six-Day War: 1947–1967
- 8 The Continuation of the Arab–Israeli Conflict: 1967–Lebanon 1982
- 9 The First Intifada and the Peace Process
- 10 The Second Intifada, Gaza, and the Obama Years: 2000–2016

Conclusion

Appendices

- 1 Chronology
- 2 Israel's Prime Ministers
- 3 General Data: Israel, Palestine

Notes

Suggested Reading

Select Bibliography

Index

Maps

- 1 The Middle East, Southwest and Central Asia
- 2 UNGA Partition Plan, 1947 (UN 181) and Armistice Lines, 1949
- 3 Post-June 1967 War: Territories occupied by Israel
- 4 Oslo II, 1995
- 5 Projection of the West Bank Final Status Map presented by Israel, Camp David II, July 2000
- 6 Fragmentation of the West Bank (June 2007)

Maps 2–5 courtesy of PASSIA. Map 6 courtesy of UN-OCHA.

Acknowledgments

From the First Edition

I would like to offer profound thanks to: Scott Darley, Ben Nowicki, Shawn Mitchell, Annie Higgins, Jeffrey Ball (Dove Booksellers), Shany Shlomo, Lahan Sarid, Ali Abu Shawish, Naim Toubassi, Zaid Alayobi, Ryan Robinson, Jerilyn Tabor, Michael Pugh, Alfonso Flores V, Clement Cherian, Jan Larsen (the Herald News), and George David Miller. Many thanks are owed to Alex Lubertozzi and Jennifer Fusco at Prologue Publishing for much-needed direction and guidance. To Roger van Zwanenberg, Julie Stoll, David Castle, Robert Webb, Matthew Seal, and everyone at Pluto Press I am thankful for realizing this project. I am grateful to Professor Arthur Goldschmidt Jr and Professor Charles D. Smith for their availability, honesty, and advice. I am indebted to my mother, Martha Harms, and George Savich for their early and much-needed help. Grant and Genevieve Harms (both of whom passed during the writing of this book, and a second dedication would go to them), and my father, Joseph, and Diana Harms all provided me with humbling support and hospitality at the farm.

I am grateful for immediate and unbending support of this project to Mark Eleveld, who upon my initial consideration of the idea firmly encouraged me to get started. Special thanks go to my friend and colleague, Todd Ferry, who thoughtfully came along at the right time and whose knowledge and expertise made a superb contribution to this book. Vikram Sura, who I met in Jerusalem, has been a tremendous source of support and counsel ever since. For innumerable reasons I am indebted to Michael Slager, countless conversations with whom have sharpened my thinking on all manner of subjects (thanks, Michael). I owe an impossible amount of gratitude to Tom Jasper for his selfless generosity and encouraging fireside chats (and to Givon and Madison Jasper for helpin' their Uncle G).

Lastly, I am grateful to the people in Israel and Palestine who, far too numerous to list here, showed me hospitality, friendship, and openness during my time spent researching there in June 2002. It is in these qualities and people that their leaders can – and must – find an exemplar.

All those noted above contributed to this project in a multitude of ways, the sum total of which made this possible. For the existence of this book they have an equal share in its arrival; for the contents and any errors therein, I alone am responsible.

Gregory Harms

Preface to the Fourth Edition

“Who’s fighting and what for?”

Mick Jagger, Altamont Raceway, 1969

The Palestine–Israel conflict is a fixture in news media the world over. And though taking place on a very small area of land, the tensions between Israel and Palestine send shockwaves around the globe. The conflict spanned most of the previous century and all of the present one so far. It has been documented, recorded, and analyzed in meticulous scholarly detail. We know well the history and its multitude of moving parts.

Yet, confusion persists, as do polarity and controversy. Especially in the United States, there exists a bewilderment and a tendency to deal in fallacies, fictions, and mythology. Oftentimes, in reaction to the news or conversations about the conflict, you might hear people make remarks such as: “Those people have been fighting for thousands of years.” Or: “They’re fighting because one guy’s ancestors killed the other’s.” Or: “It has to do with religion and goes back to the Bible.” Given the manner in which the conflict is packaged by the media – as a perpetual tallying of death and violence with no historical context – it is not surprising that many commonly make such judgments. But as with many things, what actually lies beneath the received imagery is quite different from the surface we are shown. This book attempts to provide what the news doesn’t.

When I first set to working on the first edition of this book in late 2001, it was in response to two issues: Firstly, I had for years been confused with the utter lack of introductory material on the Palestine–Israel conflict. There was, of course, an abundance of books on the subject, but they were either big, specialized, or both; for such a topical and important issue, people had precious little to choose from if they wanted to get a “101” sense of the basics. Secondly, and more specifically, the September 11 attacks brought matters of the Middle East much closer to home. Not that this necessarily made them more important, but the experience was a stimulus in my decision making. Shortly after that Tuesday morning, I started assembling this project.

In producing the book I could never find I merely had to take stock of what was not being made available to readers and the news-watching public, namely: an introduction to the entire history of Canaan–Palestine–Israel, from the Paleolithic period to the present day. As a result, the first half of this book has almost nothing to do with the conflict directly; but a basic knowledge of the region’s deep history is crucial to understanding and demythologizing the conflict. Naturally, the best way to dispel any myth is to present the facts that undermine it, and therefore the ancient history is covered in this book to demonstrate that “those people” have not been fighting “for thousands of years.”

The book is broken up into three main sections. Part I addresses the background history of the region from the dawn of humankind to the final moments of the Ottoman Empire (early 1900s).

Part II introduces the people involved in the conflict: the Palestinians and the European Jews who founded Zionism and eventually established the state of Israel. Part III discusses the actual conflict, from its earliest moments onward through to the current situation.

No prior knowledge is assumed on the part of the reader. Moreover, questions I have repeatedly encountered at lectures have given me a base for what the reader might be wondering: What is the West Bank? Is (or was) Palestine a country? Is religion a factor? What is Zionism? Were the Jews or Arabs there first? I have tried to clarify these, while endeavoring to anticipate further curiosities and possible confusion. However, if I have overlooked something that you were hoping to have answered, or a topic I have discussed remains muddled, please tell me about it: gharms@gmail.com.

A word about balance and objectivity. The topic of Palestine–Israel generates suspicion about bias like none other. Accusations fly and tempers can flare over the slightest indication of a person or piece of writing leaning one way or the other: so-and-so is pro-Israeli, such-and-such a book is pro-Palestinian. For you the reader, I suggest making every effort to keep an open mind, avoid this trap of polarity, and read critically, starting with this book. The conflict is not a sporting event where people pick a side and root accordingly (though many do). It is a political conflict over which life is lost. As someone who is maybe new to the conflict, try to examine the history and come to an understanding of what is at stake, what the key issues are, and what could be done about it. “Objectivity” is a word that has practically lost its meaning, and has frequently come to mean imposing symmetry where things are not necessarily symmetrical, thus distorting the actual situation. I have sought to present the history of the conflict clearly and impartially. Regardless, however, of my efforts at handling sources critically and writing with caution, the reader will ultimately be the judge of my success.

I hope this new edition will continue to serve the needs of those readers returning from previous editions. For those picking it up for the first time I hope the book accommodates what Todd and I set out to provide. For both groups, may your curiosity and concern about the book’s subject matter be sustained – and contagious.

NEW TO THE FOURTH EDITION

The years 2011 to 2016 have been incorporated into Chapter 10, which now includes the entirety of the Obama years. Among the added material is a revised discussion of the Arab Spring and the inclusion of: Operation Pillar of Defense (2012), John Kerry’s diplomacy, Operation Protective Edge (2014), the spate of stabbings since 2015, the UN Security Council activity at the end of Obama’s second term, and the Kerry principles. Chapters 1–9, aside from small alterations, in essence remain as they were in the previous edition. The appendices, namely, the Chronology and General Data, have all been brought up to date. And the Suggested Reading section has been revamped.

Jamie Stern-Weiner and Shir Hever lent keen expertise to their readings of the new material for Chapter 10, for which I am very thankful. Regarding time spent in the Middle East over summer 2014, many thanks go to Dr. Mohammad “Mo” Hishmeh and his family – and the greater contingent in Abu Dis and Azariya, West Bank – for their kindness, generosity, and hospitality; likewise, much appreciation goes to Hani al-Refae (Hotel Farah) in Amman. To the Mark Eleveld family, my sincere gratitude for longtime support. I am also grateful to (and for) Lauren and Marcus, just because.

Gregory Harms

Introduction

THE MIDDLE EAST

Though this book examines the Palestine–Israel conflict, it is important we get our bearings and go in with an understanding of where it is we are talking about. You might already know that the conflict is a Middle Eastern issue, and that it involves Arabs and Jews, but what do these terms mean exactly?

The Middle East is a region we are all at least roughly familiar with, given the attention it attracts. Yet, getting down to discussing what it is precisely can lead to vacant stares and head scratching. The very term itself – “Middle East” – is confusing upon initial consideration: the middle of where, and east of what? If you live in India it is hardly east, and if you live in Mexico, well, the term is pretty much useless. Clearly, these labels are relative to Western Europe, suggesting its global centrality. According to the Encyclopaedia Britannica:

[The Middle East consists of] the lands around the southern and eastern shores of the Mediterranean Sea, extending from Morocco to the Arabian Peninsula and Iran and sometimes beyond. The central part of this general area was formerly called the Near East, a name given to it by some of the first modern Western geographers and historians, who tended to divide the Orient into three regions. Near East applied to the region nearest Europe, extending from the Mediterranean Sea to the Persian Gulf; Middle East, from the Gulf to Southeast Asia; and Far East, those regions facing the Pacific Ocean.¹

The designation of the Middle East changed around the time Great Britain established colonial control in Egypt in the 1880s, where it then began to include what had previously been labeled the Near East in the above quote. As for the term Orient, this word usually connotes far-East Asian imagery – jade dragons, ornate lamps with tassels, and so on. However, the Orient (meaning “east”) is Asia taken in its entirety, from Israel to Japan, including most of Russia. So, technically, what we call the Middle East could (should) be called West or Southwest Asia. However, for the purposes of this book, we will carry on the Eurocentric tradition and call it the Middle East.

What countries make up the Middle East? Egypt, Israel–Palestine, Jordan, Syria, Lebanon, Iraq, Iran, plus the countries that comprise the Arabian Peninsula: Saudi Arabia, Yemen, Oman, United Arab Emirates, Qatar, Bahrain, and Kuwait. All these nation-states are also considered Arab, with the exception of Iran whose inhabitants are Persian, and Israel where most are Jewish. Turkey and Greece are sometimes considered Middle Eastern.

A note about the Maghreb: This region of North Africa, from the Atlantic Ocean to the Mediterranean Sea – incorporating Mauritania, Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia, and Libya – while not regionally Middle Eastern, is considered culturally so. The five countries that make up the Maghreb are also members of the Arab League. Sudan, which is part of the Arab League but not part of the Maghreb, is also considered Arab/Middle Eastern. South Sudan seceded from Sudan in 2011 and is not a member of the Arab League.

THE PEOPLE

Though we get into it in Chapters 1 and 2, an Arab is simply someone who speaks Arabic, and who has grown up in and identifies with Arab culture, which is also typically Middle Eastern. As Britannica puts it: “This diverse assortment of peoples defies physical stereotyping.”² A Jew, on the other hand, is a person who believes in the religious tenets of Judaism and may have some ethnic roots tracing back to what may have been an original population group from Canaan/Palestine. Much more will be said about these matters later. Likewise, we will also get into the particulars of Islam in Chapter 2, but just keep in mind that Muslims are people who practice Islam, and may or may not be Arab. (Actually, most Muslims are not Arab.) Looking at the current numbers:³

- There are 1.6 billion Muslims worldwide. In comparison, there are: 2.2 billion Christians, 1 billion Hindus, and 500 million Buddhists. (The world’s total population is 7 billion.)
- Twenty percent of Muslims are Arab, whereas 95 percent of the world’s 260 million Arabs are Muslim.
- The four countries with the most Muslims in them, in order, are: Indonesia (209 million), India (176 million), Pakistan (167 million), and Bangladesh (134 million).
- The Middle Eastern countries listed in the previous section, with the exception of Israel, are about 90 percent Muslim. Israel is 76 percent Jewish.

Okay, we are ready to begin our exploration of the Palestine–Israel conflict, and are going to cover a little over a million years of history in 214 pages, which makes for an average of 4,673 years per page. Let’s begin.

Map 1 The Middle East, Southwest and Central Asia

I

Regional History

The first three chapters will look at the regional history of Canaan and Palestine, from the most ancient eras up to the eve of World War I: from the emergence of the Hebrews and the Arabs to Muhammad and the birth of Islam, the Crusades, the Mongols, and the Ottoman Empire. A sketch of where today's Palestinians and Israelis come from gives us a sense of context when we try to examine the Palestine–Israel conflict. It is important to keep in mind as a point of reference that the ancient histories of the region have NO direct causal significance in the modern conflict. Tempting as it is to assume the fighting stretches that far back, the conflict between the Palestinians and the Israelis goes back not even one hundred years. A survey of the history from the Paleolithic period to the decline and fall of the Ottoman Empire makes this apparent.

1

Canaan–Palestine: Ancient History

Todd M. Ferry

THE ANCIENT HISTORY OF PALESTINE

Why begin a book like this so far back in time from the present? First, we need to dispel the common misconception that the Palestine–Israel conflict is a struggle that has lasted for hundreds of years, millennia, or even since the time of Abraham’s sons, Isaac and Ishmael. Second, it is important to show change over time. The history of the region goes back many thousands of years. Over that time, many peoples have populated the land of Palestine – not just Arabs and Jews – and they lived together, intermixed, intermarried, merged, and grew apart. Change is central to this story and so it will be constantly emphasized. Lastly, we need to be aware of the shared heritage of both peoples. Though Palestinians and Jews see themselves as different now, there is a remarkable congruence to their histories that should be remembered when considering the modern conflict and both people’s claims to the land of Palestine.

Before we begin we need to say a word about the Bible.¹ The first place people often turn to for the history of ancient Palestine is the Bible, and indeed it has been the single most influential source. No doubt it offers a rare glimpse into the history of Israel as well as Israel’s neighbors. But the Bible is religious literature written and compiled for reasons other than the purely historical. We know from critical study that it is a composite text made up of several books, each of which has its own religious, cultural, political, and personal (the writer’s) perspective. It has also been copied, translated, and redacted (edited) by people with their own understanding of its meaning. In brief it has its own “spin” on history that may or may not reflect actual events and certainly not every side to the story.

There are other sources at our disposal. If our concern is for a fuller, more complete understanding of the ancient history of Palestine then archaeology, non-biblical texts, geography, and other interdisciplinary forms of study, should all have a hand in historical reconstruction. In this very general overview of the history of ancient Palestine we will attempt to bring in as much of these other sources as we can, while also drawing on histories of others who try to do the same. It all sounds complicated at first, and though reconstructing the history of ancient Palestine is a very complex matter, this chapter will attempt to make it easily understandable.

CHRONOLOGY AND GEOGRAPHY

Before we begin, a quick chronological and geographical note. Over thousands of years the cultures of Palestine changed. Conventional approaches break down the ancient history of the region into periods following technological change (Bronze Age, Iron Age, etc.) or some other dominant feature (Hellenistic Age, Roman Empire, etc.). These will be noted in the section headings as we go. We will also be using BCE (Before Common Era) and CE (Common Era) instead of the abbreviations AD (Anno Domini) and BC (Before Christ). The Common Era abbreviations are now the convention, in an attempt to avoid religious preferences.

Regarding geography, I have chosen to use “Palestine” as the most neutral and encompassing of modern names for the region (though this is certainly debatable).² For the ancient periods, I will start with the broad territorial term “Canaan,” since it was one of the first recorded names for the region. Ancient Canaan covers an area slightly larger than the modern land of Palestine (including Israel, Gaza, and the West Bank), to encompass Lebanon, southern Syria, the western half of Jordan, and the Sinai Peninsula. As the many specific kingdoms (Israel, Philistia, Moab, etc.), empires (Assyrian, Neo-Babylonian, etc.), or provinces (Judaea, Samerina, etc.) are established in the region, I will refer to them by what they were called in antiquity and describe them as we go. Don’t worry, it’s pretty straightforward.

SETTING THE STAGE

Over the course of several hundred thousand years known as the Paleolithic period (Paleolithic, “the stone age”: 1.4 million years ago to 8500 BCE) human beings evolved, left Africa, and came to Palestine, developing their own unique cultures. During the following Neolithic period (“the new stone age”: 8500–4300 BCE) they settled in villages, learned to domesticate animals and plants, and discovered clay could be manipulated into shapes and baked to form pottery – huge achievements in an amazingly short period of time. In the Chalcolithic period (“the copper and stone age”: 4300–3300 BCE) their villages got larger, their homes more permanent, and they discovered how to make things for the first time with metal (copper). While all of this early pre-history is certainly important, it is really in the following periods that we know more about the ancient history of Palestine and when we begin to see one of the most important cultures in the region develop. Here we will begin with our more detailed survey – in the Bronze Age.

THE BRONZE AGE AND THE CANAANITES (Early: 3300–2000 BCE, Middle: 2000–1550 BCE, Late: 1550–1150 BCE)

By the beginning of the Bronze Age people in Palestine were living in well-fortified, walled cities. Palestine was becoming urban, and urbanism changed the social structure of ancient society. As is true for most of the ancient Near East, people lived in tribal societies where everything was based on kinship relations. You were part of a tribe, the member of a family, and the son of your father. Now with true urbanism, you could (though not everyone was) also be associated with a city or town. It is from the archaeological excavation of these cities (called “tells”) that we have been able to learn so much about the ancient peoples of Palestine – and one people in particular during this period.

By the beginning of the Middle Bronze Age a whole new and important culture, called Canaanite culture, took hold of the region. The majority of peoples in Canaan spoke the same Semitic language, made similar styles of pottery and weapons and art from bronze (for which the period is named), and shared the same religion of many gods, whose head god, famously, was El (mentioned in the Bible). Ancient people even referred to the population of the region as “Canaanite.” The term is used consistently throughout the Bible, and it is found in archives from Syria, Egypt, and Mesopotamia dating to the Middle Bronze Age and later.³ Remember the Canaanites because they remain important for much of the following.

Now, the Canaanites were not alone. Palestine has always been the crossroads of the Near East; people came and went, passing through from one region to the next. It was an especially busy place during the Bronze Age. The Amorites, from Syria, are one group that migrated in and may have had a particularly profound effect on the Canaanite way of life. Joining with the local population, they brought new types of architecture and new artistic traditions to Canaanite culture. Movement between Canaan and Egypt was also quite common during this period (indeed, throughout Palestine’s history), and for some unknown reason, perhaps because of famine or even pressure from the Amorite migration, some Canaanites moved south into Lower Egypt (the Delta region). Once in the Delta, they managed to take control of it and rule for over a hundred years as what would be called the Hyksos or “foreign” Dynasty.

The history of this period is very important for biblical historians. Many, including one of the most famous and influential archaeologists to study ancient Palestine, William F. Albright,⁴ attempted to place the stories of the biblical patriarchs Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Joseph, in the Middle Bronze Age period. Abraham and his family’s journey from Ur to Harran and then south to Canaan is often tied to the Amorite migration. At first it seems the journey of Abraham might fit that description very well – but unfortunately, it is not that easy. There is no proof that what we call the Middle Bronze Age is the period the biblical writers had in mind, and while it seems to make a suitable backdrop for Abraham’s life, other periods would work just as well. Neither do superficial similarities between Abraham and the Amorites prove that a historical Abraham existed. Most scholars suggest that he is more likely a mythical or literary figure of tradition to be remembered for his moral lessons and religious piety.

“Semitic”

The term “Semitic” derives from the biblical table of nations where Noah’s son Shem is said to be the father of Arabs, Babylonians, Assyrians, Aramaeans, and Hebrews (Gen. 10). Historically it has been applied both as a linguistic and a cultural term. As a linguistic term it describes, very well, the similarities among a particular family of languages spoken in the Middle East. The Semitic languages are among a branch of the Afro-Asiatic language family, which includes such languages as (in historical order): Akkadian, Phoenician, Hebrew, Aramaic, Ethiopic, and Arabic, among many other lesser known and ancient languages, such as Ugaritic and Proto-Sinaitic. It might seem strange to think that Hebrew, Ethiopic, and Arabic are all related languages. There are many differences between them, but overall, the grammar, syntax, system of writing (for example right to left), the sounds, and even some roots and words are the same. As a linguistic term Semitic is useful, as a cultural term it is not. The problem with using Semitic to describe a culture is that the cultures referred to as Semitic are so diverse. Though they speak similar languages, the people are not at all the same. Sometimes the term is used to designate Jews singularly, but often in a derogatory way, making the term, again, not very useful to describe a people and culture. The best way to avoid all of this is to use Semitic only as a linguistic term and refer to each distinct group of people as they wish to be called.

The story of the patriarch Joseph’s enslavement and later high position under Pharaoh is also often linked to Hyksos rule over Egypt. Here again, we are in the same situation as with the Abraham story. A historical Joseph may or may not have existed, and though the parallels are intriguing, as of yet, little more can be said. The same is true of the other patriarchal figures. That is not to deny their religious significance; faith, of course, requires one to look beyond proof.

Early Indications of Israel

The Late Bronze Age began with a reversal of Canaanite/Hyksos fortunes in Egypt and, indeed, Canaan as well. Egypt chased the Hyksos dynasty out of the Delta, sending them running back to Canaan, but the Egyptians did not stop there. Surprisingly, they invaded bringing all of Canaan under Egyptian control. Pharaoh only loosely ruled the region, but governors were placed in the major cities along with small armies. We learn from letters (on clay tablets) sent from these governors of Canaan back to Egypt, however, that some native Canaanites would not bow down to their Egyptian masters. They turned their backs on Egyptian-controlled Canaanite society to become what the Egyptians called “bandits and marauders” or Hapiru in the language of the letters.

The similarity between this name and “Hebrew” has not gone unnoticed – and here we enter into the mystery of the first Israelites and where they came from. There is no archaeological or textual proof this early on for the people soon to be known as Israelites, but there are some fascinating hints as to its origins. These letters are the first major breakthrough. The two names Hapiru/Hebrew, it turns out, are not synonymous. The range and context of Hapiru in most letters suggests it was not used singularly for one ethnic group.⁵ But the possibility remains that the Israelites are somehow related to the Hapiru and that they might have been an offshoot or formed a unified group under similar circumstances.

The Late Bronze Age affords us other tantalizing indications of the Israelites’ origins. The Shasu who roamed the deserts of southeastern Canaan are another important group we know from Egyptian sources. Much like the Hapiru, they too were considered marauders and bandits and a general nuisance for Egypt’s routes north into Palestine. Most intriguing about the Shasu, however, is that they worshipped a god by the name of YHW, or Yahweh. Moreover, and equally intriguing, the Shasu land, later called Edom in the Bible, contains within its bounds the traditional site of Mount Sinai.⁶ Can this be coincidence? Here may be found a source for later Israelite Yahwism, but how the god might have passed from Shasu to the Israelites remains uncertain. Some have suggested Edomite–Shasu clans migrated into Canaan bringing the deity Yahweh with them, and that this may have taken place during the Israelite Exodus from Egypt.

We need to touch on the Exodus for a moment since the Late Bronze Age is the period most often suggested for a historical setting to the story. It is probably the most famous story in the Bible and central to the development of Judaism. Moses leads the Hebrews out of slavery and through the desert to Canaan, the promised land of milk and honey. However, despite what some have tried to show, evidence for the Exodus has yet to be discovered. The extra-biblical sources are conspicuously silent. No proof has yet verified the events within Egypt, the forty years spent by the Hebrews wandering the desert, nor even the existence of the great lawgiver Moses.

The last clue for the early origins of the Israelites comes at the very end of the period and is the most significant. A Pharaoh of Egypt named Merneptah (r. 1237–1226 BCE) conducted a campaign into Canaan listing the cities he conquered on a stone tablet called a stele. Appearing among these many cities is the word “Israel” after which is the Egyptian symbol for a people or tribe. It is called the “Israel Stele,” and here is the first solid evidence for a people called Israel – but again, it is only so helpful. We have in it only the occurrence of the name and a general location, but it is the first inkling of a people we learn a great deal more about in the following periods.

EARLY IRON AGE AND ISRAEL (Iron Age I: 1150–900 BCE)

Egypt, suffering from political and economic problems, pulled out of Canaan at the end of the Late Bronze Age. With Egypt’s departure, what is often described as a “power vacuum” (lack of a political power structure) was left for the remaining peoples to attempt to fill. It is at this juncture in history that the famous kingdoms of the Bible take shape and battle to control the region. Just to the east the kingdoms of Moab, Ammon, and Edom are forming; on the southern coast the Philistines appear; to the north are the Phoenicians, and in the highlands the Israelites emerge.

It is with this historical setting in mind that scholars have tried to answer the major question: Who were the Israelites and where did they come from? For the past several decades there have been three reigning models. They are significantly different, but each of them attempts to describe where the Israelites came from and how Israel became a kingdom.

The Conquest Model and the Peaceful Infiltration Model are both based on traditional biblical history.⁷ The Conquest Model, articulated most adamantly by Albright (again), suggests the Israelites existed as described in the Bible’s patriarchal stories. They came to Canaan during the Exodus and invaded the region pretty much as recorded in the Book of Joshua. Albright’s argument is detailed and originally made great strides in the study of biblical history by relying on archaeological evidence – not just the Bible. He studied the archaeological remains of sites known to be the biblical cities conquered in Joshua and showed a similar pattern of destruction for many of them dated to around the end of the Late Bronze Age. Archaeologists have since reassessed Albright’s evidence and proven his interpretation of the data wrong. New evidence may arise to rekindle Albright’s model, but until then, most scholars deny it any validity.

The Peaceful Infiltration Model, on the other hand, relies on the history of Judges and Samuel and goes into a little more detail. While rooted in biblical history, it also relies on social theory as well as ethnographic studies of nomadic desert tribes. In this model the Israelites were nomads from the surrounding regions who, over time, peacefully entered the highlands of Canaan and became settled there. As Egyptian power waned, the kingdoms of Palestine, including the burgeoning Israelites, began to assert themselves. The Philistines dominated Canaan at the time and began to push into the highlands from the other direction. In reaction to the Philistine threat, the now-settled nomads formed a confederacy of twelve tribes, Israel, then a nation under a king, Saul. They defended their land and conquered the Philistines, whereupon the rest of central Canaan fell under their power.

The Peasant Revolt Model is significantly different.⁸ It applied Marxist social theory to Israel’s origin. Typical of Marxist theory, the Peasant Revolt Model casts the Israelites as a subclass of Canaanite peoples united by their religious belief in the god Yahweh. They lived much like the Hapiru mentioned earlier, until they had enough. For either social or religious reasons they revolted (think early twentieth-century Bolshevik Revolution in Russia) and took over the Canaanite city-states, eventually uniting them as the kingdom of Israel.

The Peasant Revolt Model has been the most influential on modern scholarship because it claims a Canaanite origin for the Israelites. Biblical interpretation and more recent assessments of the archaeological evidence have now led scholars to view the first Israelites as indigenous to Canaan – they were Canaanites. They probably fit the description of the Hapiru, a conglomerate of Canaanite peoples from many different backgrounds, who reacted against the social structure of the Canaanite city-states. Most see this process culminating in a new group of people who regarded themselves as different from their Canaanite predecessors. They broke away from their native Canaanite heritage and gathered in the highlands of Canaan – the traditional land of Israel and the most likely place referred to in the Israel Stele – forming the early Israelite tribal population and later organizing to become the kingdom of Israel.

Canaanites and Israelites

Once we enter the period of Israelite history the continuing history of other Canaanite peoples is often overlooked by scholars. It should not be forgotten. Canaanite culture did not simply disappear with the rise of Israel and in actuality remained vibrant throughout the region. While the Israelite kingdom ruled its slice of Canaan, and even thereafter, non-Israelite Canaanites still populated most of the land. They persisted alongside the Israelites – again originally Canaanites themselves – maintaining the old Canaanite religion and the old Canaanite culture. The Bible clearly portrays this in its numerous mentions of Canaanite gods worshipped over Yahweh and in prohibitions against Israelites mixing with Canaanites. The Canaanites also persisted in areas outside of Israel's control, forming their own kingdoms that were very much equal to Israel in size and strength, just as powerful and just as important. The Canaanite kingdoms were, very briefly: Aram, Phoenicia, Moab, Ammon, and Edom. With the addition of Philistia, a kingdom of Aegean peoples on the coast of Canaan, these kingdoms shared Palestine with Israel (see box: Canaanite Kingdoms).

Canaanite Kingdoms

Aram: Aram was located to the north and controlled nearly all of modern-day Syria. Homeland of the Aramaeans, it was one of Israel's greatest foes until the end of the Northern Kingdom of Israel. The Aramaeans spoke a Semitic language called Aramaic, which became the major language of the Near East from the seventh century BCE until the Hellenistic Period (discussed later).

Phoenicia: Located on the northern coast, the Phoenicians were close friends of the early Israelite kingdom. According to the Bible, they even helped to build Solomon's temple. The Phoenicians traded all over the Near East, spreading merchant colonies across the Mediterranean region, even as far west as Spain. Legend has it they also spread alphabetic writing, a Semitic invention, to the Greeks – from which is descended the English alphabet.

Moab: Located east of the Jordan River, the Moabites were constantly at odds with the Israelite kingdoms of Judah and Israel. Moab controlled one of the largest fertile plains in ancient Canaan and much of the trade with kingdoms further east.

Edom: Located to the south and east of Judah, Edom was home to the Edomites and the Shasu people discussed previously. Edom shared a close relationship with Judah and was ruled by Judah until it revolted in the late ninth century BCE. It had a famous trading port on the Red Sea, now modern Eilat, and was known for its copper mines.

Ammon: Located east of the Jordan River near the modern city of Amman, the Ammonites were among the Israelites' earliest enemies in the Bible. This kingdom controlled a major portion of ancient Near Eastern trade across the great deserts. Nearly all the trade from Arabia and points east passed through its lands.

Philistia: The Philistines are the exception. They have no relation to Canaanite culture, but upon their arrival they were major players in Palestine's history. An Aegean people (from the region of the Aegean Sea), bringing with them their own Aegean culture, they arrived on the southern coast of Canaan sometime in the twelfth century BCE.

Each of these many kingdoms was equal in power and struggled to gain the upper hand over the others. Surprisingly, they remained mostly autonomous until foreign empires swept in from the east. Since the history of Israel is the best known of the kingdoms, and remains central to the rest of the book, it will serve as the example for what happened to all the inhabitants of Canaan when empire came. That is not to say that all the kingdoms of Canaan had the same experience, but only that each had to cope with a loss of autonomy and rule by a foreign power, just as Israel did.

ISRAEL AND THE EMPIRES (Iron Age II: 900–539 BCE)

Early Israelite Monarchy (1000–925 BCE)

The United Kingdom of Israel was short lived. It lasted through three kings – Saul, David, and Solomon. Saul is known for establishing the nation, David for conquering the lands, and Solomon as the great administrator and builder. At the death of Solomon, around 925 BCE, the United Kingdom split into the two new kingdoms of Judah (in the south) and Israel (in the north). Never again were they to be united. It is clear that they still viewed each other as having a common heritage, but for the most part, they went their separate ways.

Assyrian Empire (900–609 BCE)

Shortly after 1000 BCE the kingdom of Assyria (in modern-day Iraq) began its dramatic rise to power, eventually to rule over almost the whole of the Near East. By the end of the eighth century BCE, all the old kingdoms of Canaan were conquered or made vassals and subsumed into the greater Assyrian Empire. At its height it ruled over an area making up parts of the modern states of Turkey, Egypt, Palestine, Syria, Iraq, and Iran. Much of its power rested in the fear of its ruthlessness.

Perhaps most representative of Assyria's brutal politics are the last days of the northern kingdom of Israel. Israel attempted to revolt and in response its capital, Samaria, was sacked in 720 BCE.⁹ The city was completely destroyed. Those who were captured by the Assyrians were transported to Assyria and "the cities of Media" (modern-day Iran). Assyrian annals record 27,290 Israelites sent into exile at this time.¹⁰ Israel was turned into an Assyrian province to be called Samerina and was repopulated with a mix of other conquered peoples over several years including Babylonians, Aramaeans, some "distant Arab tribes," and Philistines.¹¹

A short time later Judah also attempted revolt (701 BCE). Luckily, it faced less dire consequences. Jerusalem, the capital of Judah, was not destroyed, but it was forced to pay out a huge tribute including silver and gold from the Jerusalem temple treasury.¹² Hezekiah, king of Judah, was left on his throne but large chunks of his kingdom were handed out to the Philistine city-states. The major city in Judah, Lachish, was sacked, a feat in which Sennacherib, king of Assyria, took great pride. He devoted the relief-work of an entire room to the siege in his “palace without rival” in Nineveh. By the seventh century BCE a brief “Pax Assyrica” (Assyrian peace) under the dominion of the empire graced the region.

Neo-Babylonian Empire (612–539 BCE)

The quiet ended when the ancient and powerful city of Babylon (in modern-day Iraq) revolted from under the Assyrians. The Babylonians gradually gained ground and allies. The Assyrian Empire tried to defend itself but it had grown too large to control; it began to crumble and finally succumbed to the Babylonians in 612 BCE. The whole empire was taken over by the Babylonians without much trouble, at first.

Back in Palestine, Judah, seeing its chance, made an unsuccessful attempt to revolt against Babylon in 586 BCE. This time the outcome would be remembered as one of the most tragic events in Jewish history. In response, the Babylonians sacked Jerusalem, and the Temple to Yahweh built by King Solomon was destroyed. With the fall of Judah comes the end of the Israelite kingdoms. A large part of the population of Judah was transported to Babylon, and so began the period known in Jewish history as the Exile. The people continued on, only now primarily as a religious community. It is a formative period for Judaism, responsible for much of the codification of law and practice in the religion.

Persian Empire (539–332 BCE)

The Neo-Babylonian Empire did not last long. Cyrus “the Great,” king of Persia, rose up in revolt and was able to take over the Babylonian Empire intact. It was good news for the exiled Israelites: they were allowed to return to Judah and to rebuild the Temple to Yahweh.¹³ Traditionally, upon their return to Judah, they were called “Jews” – this is where the modern name originates. Judah, originally having no clear boundaries, became the highly administrated province of Judaea, extending over most of what is now modern Israel–Palestine.

The Jews shared Judaea with a host of other peoples whom had been transported there or had moved there on their own accord over the previous few hundred years. The most predominant group was the Edomites, who had moved north when the Jews were exiled. There was a great deal of unrest between the two and throughout the region as peoples from all different lands butted heads over territory and trade. Persian administration of the empire, thick with bureaucracy, had broken down any further chance of the ancient kingdoms of Palestine, and the rest of the ancient Near East, returning to power. Ancient Near Eastern culture was being homogenized and by the Persian period identity had become an issue. As one prominent historian puts it:

The country [Palestine] was populated by different groups of people who had lost their national identity, such as Philistines, Judahites, Samaritans (including former Israelites and peoples that had been settled in Samaria by the Assyrians), Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, Arabs, and in western and northern parts of the country the Phoenicians....¹⁴

After hundreds of years of rule by empire, the collapse and destruction of city-states and kingdoms, and the transportation of populations, a loss of national identity seems quite natural. Here too also marks the end of Canaanite culture. The old ways, Canaanite religion, language, art, architecture, and all else that once marked its originality disappeared to make way for the domination of Persian and, only a few centuries away, Greek and Roman cultures. Certainly some cultural distinctions remained intact, and religious identity would yet remain, especially for the Jews, but in the following period a great deal of assimilation takes place and indeed, is encouraged.

GREEK AND ROMAN PALESTINE

Alexander the Great and Hellenism (330–67 BCE)

Friction between the Persians and the Greeks brought to the fold one of the most memorable figures in ancient history, Alexander the Great. Alexander crossed from Macedonia, Greece into Asia in 334 BCE). Cutting his way through Persian territory, he conquered lands from Greece to Egypt and the borders of India. He brought his Greek culture with him, making concerted efforts to meld it with the different cultures of the peoples he conquered.

Shortly after Alexander's death (323 BCE) his generals sectioned up the empire, assuming first a "protectorate" role and then finally regressing into all-out war with one another for control of larger territories. The most important generals in the region of our concern were Antigonus, who took all of western Asia Minor (modern Turkey); Ptolemy, who took Egypt; and Seleucus, who eventually took all the region of greater Syria that was made to include Judaea. Over forty years of warring ensued until each new dynasty's territorial claims were recognized.¹⁵

These kings made conspicuous attempts to "hellenize" (make more Greek) the people in their territories. Hellenization under the Seleucid (Seleucus's) Empire had a profound effect on the native philosophy, religion, and culture of Palestine. Certain aspects of hellenization were willingly accepted and adopted by the people, but others were completely unacceptable – no matter how sternly they were imposed. One Seleucid king, Antiochus IV Epiphanes (r. 175–164 BCE) attempted to ban elements of Judaism altogether, even forcing sacrifice to pagan Greek gods at the Jewish Temple to Yahweh. This, coupled with the debilitating socio-economic conditions in rural Palestine at the time, led to the first of many Jewish revolts.

The Hasmonean Dynasty (166–37 BCE)

Judas Maccabeus ("the Hammer"), of the Jewish Hasmonean clan, led this first major revolt against the Seleucids. Their battles and diplomatic efforts are described in the books of Maccabees I–II. In brief, he and his followers fared well, eventually reclaiming Jerusalem in 164 BCE. One of their first tasks was to cleanse and rededicate the Temple to Yahweh, an event of great significance still celebrated every year by Jews as the feast of Hanukkah. The Hasmoneans were able to carve out a small state of their own within the larger bounds of Judaea in an attempt to regain Jewish independence. Modern scholars call this the period of the Hasmonean kingdom. It should be remembered, however, that the Seleucid Empire dominated the rest of Syria and Palestine, and control of the Hasmonean regions moved back and forth between the two powers for most of the second century BCE.

At the same time they were fighting with the Seleucids, the Hasmoneans were corresponding with the Romans. The Romans took a direct interest in the Hasmonean kingdom and its politics. Over the next half-century, as the Seleucid Empire finally collapsed, the Romans came to the fore.

Rome and Judaea (67 BCE–CE –330CE)

Between 67 and 63 BCE, Pompey of Rome took control of Syria (including Judaea) from the Seleucids without raising a finger. He entered Palestine shortly thereafter to quell a revolt led by the last of the would-be Hasmonean kings, and Judaea was made a client state. At the same time, back in Rome several parties were vying for control of the empire. Pompey and Julius Caesar were the first to clash. Caesar won out, but after only a brief respite he was assassinated in 44 BCE. With Caesar dead another struggle for the Roman Empire took place, this time between Caesar's supporters Mark Antony and Octavian. Octavian would eventually become the first Roman Emperor, Augustus. In the middle of this chaos a civil war erupted among the remaining Hasmonean family over the position of high priest in Jerusalem. The Romans intervened again. This time they installed a king, Herod "the Great," in 37 BCE as king over all the territory of the Jews.

Herod was the son of the Roman procurator (an employee of the Roman emperor in civil affairs), Antipater, and early on carried favor first with Mark Antony and the Roman senate, and later with Octavian. Herodian rule inaugurated some of the most grandiose building projects ever attempted in Palestine, many of which are still visible today. His palace-fortress at Masada and his renovation of the Jewish Temple to Yahweh in Jerusalem (it wasn't grand enough for Herod) are the two most cited examples.

At his death, Herod's kingdom was split among his family. Archelaus (r. 4 BCE–6 CE) received the largest territory but was later deposed for his brutality. His territory was transferred to a Roman procurator who now controlled all the lands of the region, and Judaea was absorbed, as a minor province, into the larger Roman province of Syria. There would be no more Jewish kings.

It is in this setting that the life and teachings of Jesus of Nazareth took place. The revolutionary Nazarene and his followers should be viewed as one of many groups in Judaea reacting against poor treatment under Roman rule and the romanization–hellenization of Jewish culture. The more violent revolutionary groups were the Zealots and Sicarii. Their resistance to Roman rule eventually led to the outbreak of the first Jewish war against Rome (66–74 CE). The Jewish revolutionaries were brutally suppressed. When their main stronghold, the fortress at Masada built earlier by King Herod, was finally breached, many Jews committed suicide rather than be taken alive by the Romans. Jerusalem was also sacked in the name of Rome, and, most tragic of all, as a final act of retaliation the Jewish Temple to Yahweh, built in the Persian period and renovated by King Herod, was burned to the ground. All that remains now is the temple platform and its visible Western Wall (also called the "Wailing Wall," or in Hebrew the Kotel); it is Judaism's most sacred site and remains a place of pilgrimage and prayer for Jews all over the world.

Things remained relatively quiet until around 130 CE, when the Emperor Hadrian visited Palestine intent on rebuilding Jerusalem in the mold of a Greco-Roman city and to ban the Jewish practice of circumcision once and for all. It was a new and unappreciated attempt at hellenizing the region. To top it all off economic disparities were already high, stirring the people again to revolution.

The second and last major Jewish war against Rome (132–135 CE) broke out under the charismatic leadership of Bar Kochba, sometimes called the Bar Kochba Revolt. It is uncertain whether the whole of Palestine took part, but Judaea was certainly at its center, and it paid a heavy price. The revolt was suppressed, but in a particularly bloody manner. Some scholars estimate that two-thirds of the Jewish population of Judaea was annihilated. The final result was that Jerusalem became a completely hellenized, Gentile (non-Jewish) city, rebuilt and renamed Aelia Capitolina. Jews were barred from entering the new city by imperial decree and threat of death. The Jews were scattered throughout the empire, eventually as far as Europe – thus beginning what is known as the Jewish diaspora (dispersion of people from their homeland). As a final insult, a shrine to Jupiter was built on the old site of the Temple to Yahweh in Jerusalem, and in the year 139 CE the name for the minor province of Roman Judaea was changed to Palaestina, from which comes the modern name Palestine.

The following hundred years saw a codification of both Judaism and Christianity. The Jews wrote down their oral laws and commentary on the law in a book called the Talmud, and the Christians compiled the gospels and epistles into what became the New Testament. At the same time the Roman Empire was in decay and appeared headed for collapse. Between 235 and 275 CE Rome had 37 different emperors. It was the leadership of several emperors that revived the flagging empire, but one in particular changed the empire for good.

The Byzantine Empire (330 CE to the rise of Islam)

The Emperor Constantine (r. 313–337) brought order to the chaos of Rome's collapse by reordering the empire from the ground up. Perhaps his most famous innovation was to move the capital of the Roman Empire to a more central location – a smart move since Rome was now in charge of much of the Near East. Power over the empire was transferred from Rome to the city of Byzantium (hence the name Byzantine Empire), located on the Bosphorus Straits (modern-day Turkey), around 330 CE, and eventually called Constantinople in honor of the emperor. He also took a special interest in Christianity; it was rumored he had a vision where he was directed to put the sign of the cross on his army's shields – he won every battle thereafter.

Christianity was popular, but it was a bit surprising to the Romans to find the emperor promoting it to the status of a full-fledged, legal Roman religion (the Edict of Milan). The other pagan gods were still worshipped, but now Christianity had achieved the seal of Roman authority. It was no longer the religion of the poor, and its followers would no longer be hounded by imperial persecution (with a few exceptions). With the Christians in charge, the Jews of the empire were subject to yet more persecution, this time for the crucifixion of Jesus, but it was not constant, and at other times the Jews were granted quite a bit of autonomy.

Palestine usually prospered under the Byzantine Empire. Jerusalem was hailed as the center for Christianity with Rome taking second place. Christian monuments began popping up all over Jerusalem. It was during this time that the site of Jesus's crucifixion and the remains of the true cross were discovered by Constantine's mother, Helena; the Church of the Holy Sepulchre was built on the site and still stands today. For the most part the Byzantine Empire remained relatively stable during its primacy with only the occasional war for more territory with the Persian Empire to the east – that is, until the rise of the Arab tribes and the new religion Islam, which was to become the leading faith in the region.

SUMMARY AND CONCLUSIONS

In view of what we now know about ancient Palestine, a few important points should be made in summary. First, the Palestine–Israel conflict is not thousands of years old. There is certainly no “blood feud” between Arabs and Jews dating back to the sons of Abraham. Secondly, the variety of cultures and the dramatic degree to which cultures have changed over time should now be apparent. From the Canaanites to the Romans, these are the roots of ancient Palestinian and Jewish culture. Thirdly, Jews, the descendants of the ancient Israelites, are as such also descendants of the ancient Canaanites, the peoples of Canaan, now modern Palestine. And indeed, by one name or another, the Jews have populated the land for thousands of years. What we have not yet emphasized and what needs to be made explicit, however, is that the native Palestinians of today are also descendants of the ancient Canaanites.

“Palestinian” is a regional ethnic term for a people who have lived in the land of Palestine for thousands of years, from Canaanite to Phoenician or Moabite or Edomite, etc., to the same people under Roman, then Greek, then Byzantine, and then Arab occupation, the people intermarrying with these other populations but continuing on just the same. The Palestinian–Arab culture of today is a result of a later seventh–century influx of Arab tribes who brought with them the religion of Islam, Arab culture, language, and the intermixing of Arab peoples with the population of Palestine – all of this will be discussed in the following chapter. But modern Arab Palestinians are, in effect, also originally descendants of the indigenous Canaanite population that continued in time alongside the first Israelites, then the Jews, and then the Roman–Judeans of ancient Palestine, into modern history. The Palestinians are descendants of the ancient Canaanites – by a different name and a different culture – just as are the Jews. I choose to emphasize this relationship to show first, that for a long time Israel and the other Canaanites lived in relative peace, and second, that both Jews and Palestinians have viable ancient claims to the land – in essence the same claim – that, indeed, converges in the ancient past.

Suggested Reading

For a strongly biblical interpretation of Palestine’s history, consider Hershel Shanks, ed., Ancient Israel: From Abraham to the Roman Destruction of the Temple (Washington, DC: Biblical Archaeology Society, 1999). A valuable work focusing on archaeology in Palestine is Amihai Mazar, Archaeology of the Land of the Bible: 10,000–586 BCE (New York, NY: Doubleday, 1992). For a classic review of biblical interpretation and history, see J. Maxwell Miller and John H. Hayes, A History of Ancient Israel and Judah (Philadelphia, PA: The Westminster Press, 1986). Helpful studies on the origins of Israel include: John J. McDermott, What Are They Saying About the Formation of Israel? (Mahwah, NJ: Paulist Press, 1998); and William G. Dever, Who Were the Early Israelites and Where Did They Come From? (Grand Rapids, MI: William B. Eerdmans Publishing Co., 2003). A work on the Canaanites worth looking at is Jonathan N. Tubb, Canaanites (Norman, OK: University of Oklahoma Press, 1998). For a challenging but eye-opening placement of the ancient narrative in a modern context, see Keith W. Whitelam, The Invention of Ancient Israel (London, New York: Routledge, 1996). See Nadia El-Haj, Facts on the Ground: Archaeological Practice and Territorial Self-Fashioning in Israeli Society (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2001) for an examination of the role archaeology has played in Israel’s national ideology and identity.

2

Muhammad, Islam, and the Arab Empire

Note: As we saw in Chapter 1, there was little mention of Arabs, as they do not make their way into the eastern Mediterranean portion of the Middle East until after Muhammad and the founding of Islam, which we will cover in this chapter. However, the Arabs were always present in the history of ancient Palestine, but primarily as itinerant traders and artisans, moving from the Arabian Peninsula (modern-day Saudi Arabia) along trade routes north into Palestine. Early possible reference to an Arabian tribe in Palestine is the story of the queen of Sheba, probably a Sabaean queen from southern Arabia, paying a visit to King Solomon (1 Kings 10:1–10). The first clear mention of Arabian tribes in history is in Assyrian and Babylonian texts. These suggest Arab populations moving all over the place during the first millennium. By all accounts, however, it is not until after the seventh century CE that the Arabs take a leading role in Palestine’s history, as we will now see.

PRE-ISLAMIC ARABIA

Most considerations of the Arab Middle East are subsumed within its religious context (Islam). But although rarely regarded, the history of the Arabs before the emergence of Muhammad and the Islamic faith (more on that later) is a rich and interesting one that sets the stage for everything we know as “Middle Eastern” or “Muslim” or “Arabian.”

Most likely a group who share ancestry with the Semitic peoples mentioned in the first chapter – the Hapiru, the Amorites, and others – no one is totally certain where the Arabs came from, or when they appeared as a distinct group. According to scripture and legend the Arabs are descendants of Ishmael, who was the son of Abraham and his maid Hagar; his wife Sarah was having difficulty bearing him a son, but then finally gave birth to Isaac. For the purposes of this book, however, an effort will be made to stay as close to archaeological evidence as possible, in which case we will have to shrug our shoulders a little for lack of evidence.

Our discussion of the Arabs begins on the Arabian Peninsula, what its inhabitants sometimes refer to as Jazirat al-‘Arab, “the Island of the Arabs.”¹ Though a peninsula in actuality, if one considers the northern region that connects Arabia to modern-day Iraq and Jordan – the Nufud desert – it might as well be water. It is here that we encounter people engaged in two distinct styles of living in an otherwise frequently unforgiving environment: settled people living by means of agriculture, and nomadic pastoralists.

The latter group, known as the Bedouin, could be considered the Arabian in his quintessential form. These tribes of nomads roaming the Arabian Peninsula from oasis to oasis are the embodiment of adaptation to desert life. It was the domestication of the camel that allowed the Bedouin to travel deep into the punishing deserts of Arabia. A process that took place between 3000 and 1000 BCE, the domestication of the Arabian dromedary (one-humped camel) created the ideal animal companion. With its padded feet, short body-hair, a storage of reserve fat in its hump, and its ability to drink 25 gallons of water in half as many minutes – and then rely on it for days on end, up to five in the summer and 25 in the winter – this creature provided the Bedouin with a full-service vehicle. Historian Philip K. Hitti elucidates just how full-service they were:

It is the Bedouin's constant companion, his alter ego, his foster parent. He drinks its milk instead of water (which he spares for the cattle); he feasts on its flesh; he covers himself with its skin; he makes his tent of its hair. Its dung he uses as fuel, and its urine as a hair tonic and medicine.²

So it was that the Bedouin navigated the desert, moving from one oasis to the next, subsisting on a diet of dates, milk, and the meat produced from their herds of goats and sheep (collectively referred to as ghanam).³ With this minimal lifestyle, the Bedouin Arab never took much interest in cultural pursuits such as painting or architecture, but poetry, on the other hand, is something that dwelt deep within his heart and soul.

The beauty of man lies in the eloquence of his tongue.

*old Arab adage*⁴

Sometimes referred to as the public register, or diwan, of the Arabs, pre-Islamic poetry was an expression of all aspects of nomadic desert life. The Bedouin poet, never putting his verses on paper, captured, orally recorded, and thus archived, the “expression of their collective memory.”⁵ One poetic form worthy of note is that of the qasida, or ode, which was up to one hundred lines long and rather complicated in its various metering. It was in these odes that tales of travel, battles, love lost, and the Bedouin's relationship with the desert were thus preserved and handed down the generations. Also in these poems was the expression of what is called muruwah:

[B]ravery in battle, patience in misfortune, persistence in revenge (the only justice possible at a time when no governments existed), protection of the weak, defiance toward the strong, hospitality to the visitor (even a total stranger), generosity to the poor, loyalty to the tribe, and fidelity in keeping promises. These were the moral principles that people needed in order to survive in the desert, and the verses helped to fix the muruwah in their minds.⁶

Superlative examples of Bedouin poetry (of those that have survived) have been named the “suspended poems,” or Mu'allaqat, which were later collected as the “Seven Golden Odes” and eventually appeared in English. Considered masterpieces of the art form, these poems were, legend has it, awarded the highest honor at the Fair of Ukaz.⁷ The twenty-day fair at Ukaz was an annual event where poets would exhibit, compete, and test their prowess in the art. This festival took place in the early spring of the lunar calendar when fighting was taboo, and also featured trade, commerce, and exhibitions of various kinds.

It being pre-Islamic Arabia, one might wonder who, or what, the people of Arabia were worshipping. Among the sedentary people along the west coast, as well as various tribes throughout the peninsula, there was a small presence of Judaism and a number of sects of Christianity. For most Arabs of the time, both desert and oasis alike were populated with deities, sacred objects, and demons, or jinn. Particular practices and beliefs in this pagan animism varied. Regarding their degree of spirituality, the sedentary Arabs had far more developed belief systems than their nomadic neighbors. The Bedouin tends to be religious up to a point, but has a low tolerance for gods and deities that fail to cooperate. In the words of Hitti, “religion sits very lightly indeed on his heart.”⁸

The above description of Arabia holds for at least a few thousand years. Over these millennia we cross the threshold of the eras, from BCE to CE. And it is at this threshold that Jesus of Nazareth is being born, and the empires of Rome and Persia (Iran) are large and dominant. The Persians, ruled by the Sasanids, held sway over the area of today's Iran, Iraq, Afghanistan, and Pakistan. The Romans, on the other hand, after moving their capital from Rome to the "new Rome" or Constantinople in 330, exerted their fair share of power over the Middle East as well.⁹ With Arabia stuck in the middle of this, obviously there were some points of contact and a degree of cultural exchange between these powers. Ethiopia, to the southwest of Arabia in Africa, also possessed a significant amount of power, adding to the mix.

Each of these powers – Rome, Persia, and Ethiopia – paid a client tribe for military assistance. As a result, this created a good deal of fighting in the peninsula between the three client tribes. And it was against this socio-political backdrop that the Prophet Muhammad arrived and would one day be known to the followers of Islam as "the Seal of the Prophets."

Islam

Islam (meaning "surrender" or "submission") is one of the largest religions in the world, second in size only to Christianity. Its 1.6 billion followers, or Muslims, devote themselves to Allah (God, or "the one") and study of the Quran, Islam's sacred text. The word of God was made available via revelations channeled through the archangel Gabriel to the Prophet Muhammad. For Muslims, the prophethood of Muhammad is a continuation of the prophetic traditions also found in Judaism and Christianity: Adam, Abraham, Moses, and Jesus (all of whom appear in the Quran). The act of submission to Allah is carried out through practice of the Five Pillars of Islam: (1) shahadah, or the profession that "there is no god but God; Muhammad is the Prophet of God"; (2) salah, the five daily prayers performed while facing toward Mecca, the birthplace of Muhammad and holiest city of Islam; (3) zakat, or almsgiving to the poor and underprivileged; (4) sawm, the month-long holiday of dawn-until-dusk fasting called Ramadan; and (5) the annual pilgrimage, or hajj, to the Great Mosque in Mecca, required of every Muslim at least once in their lives, though lenience toward the poor is granted.

MUHAMMAD

On the west coast of Arabia, in the town of Mecca, around the year 570, Abu al-Qasim Muhammad ibn Abd Allah ibn Abd al-Muttalib ibn Hashim was born. This being his full name, he is simply known as Muhammad. His father, Abd-Allah, died before the young boy was born, which left the grandfather, Abd al-Muttalib, who was head of the clan of Hashim (a branch of the ruling Quraysh tribe), as the child's guardian. Muhammad's mother, as was customary among Meccan families, sent the boy away to spend a couple years in the healthy climate of the desert, under the care of a wet-nurse, to live and travel with the Bedouin. At the age of six, he lost his mother, and two years later his grandfather died. Left an orphan, Muhammad was then under the care of his uncle, Abu-Talib, who became the new head of the Hashemite clan.

Abu-Talib, a caravan merchant, took his nephew on journeys into Syria where Muhammad learned the ropes of commerce and trade. But learn as he did, being an orphan in Mecca left one with few options for upward mobility. The social fabric of Mecca was such that, unlike the Bedouin, people were left to their own devices in an "every man for himself" set of circumstances. Beyond having enough to eat, Muhammad had no capital to launch him on any kind of career. In short, he was stuck.

But as luck would have it, and perhaps accompanied by a bit of intent given his situation, Muhammad met a moneyed woman by the name of Khadija while on a trade journey in his mid-twenties. Khadija entrusted her caravan to Muhammad and, being so impressed with his honesty and skill, proposed marriage to him. (No, this was not customary.) It is estimated that Muhammad was 25 years old, and fifteen years her junior. Despite her age, she bore him six children, four daughters and two sons, both of whom died in infancy. Muhammad never took any other wives during his relationship with Khadija.

Muhammad now had things in order: a wife he loved and the money he needed. But with these needs met and the attendant sense of stability that goes with it, Muhammad still found himself lacking a sense of fulfillment. Having endured the hardships of his youth and now seeing Mecca through adult eyes, Muhammad grew disturbed and dismayed with the condition of his society. In stark contrast to the familial solidity of the Bedouin clans lay a Mecca of materialism, greed, and ravenous individualism. This weighed heavy on Muhammad's heart. In an attempt to sort through his thoughts and feelings, he took to meditating in a cave in the hills near his neighborhood. During one of his moments of meditation, around the year 610, a strange feeling came over Muhammad. He had a vision of an angelic being and heard a voice:

Recite in the name of your Lord who created – created man from clots of blood.

Recite! Your Lord is the Most Bountiful One, who by the pen taught man what he did not know.

(Quran 96:1–5)¹⁰

Understandably, Muhammad was unsettled by this experience and ran home to Khadija, where she assuaged his fears and covered him with a coat. Khadija consulted a cousin of hers, who reassured her that Muhammad was not in a state of madness but, on the contrary, had experienced revelations from God. With this steadfast support at home, Muhammad found the confidence and resolve to heed the revelations spoken to him by the being whom he later identified as the archangel Gabriel. (A point to consider: it is common for women in Arab countries to play an extremely subservient role, but it was a woman's wisdom and support that was probably responsible for Muhammad embarking on his life as a prophet in the first place.) For the rest of his life, Muhammad would frequently receive such revelations, the accumulation of which would later become what is known as the Quran.

By 613 Muhammad was preaching to the public and proselytizing his fellow Meccans, developing a small following initially. Most of his followers were young men in their twenties and thirties from middle-class families. As his circle expanded and his influence strengthened, the leading families of the Quraysh tribe grew irritable with Muhammad and his preaching. Posing a threat to their power and their financial interests, the Quraysh began to make Muhammad feel unwelcome in Mecca. The heat continued to rise. In addition, in 619 Khadija and Abu-Talib both died. Losing his strongest sources of support, Muhammad was rendered vulnerable. It was time to leave Mecca.

During the pagan pilgrimage to the Ka'bah in 620, Muhammad was approached by some men from Yathrib (eventually known as Medina), an oasis about 200 miles north of Mecca. These men expressed their support and faithfulness, promising to return to Yathrib and pave the way for the Prophet's arrival. By September 24, 622, Muhammad and about 70 followers emigrated to Yathrib. This emigration, or hijrah (which also translates as "the severing of kinship ties"), marks the beginning of Islamic history, falling precisely on July 16, 622.

Once settled in at Yathrib, the name of the oasis was changed to Medina (madinat al-nabi, “the city of the Prophet”). Initially, Muhammad acted as an arbiter settling disputes between a few of the pagan tribes of Medina, as he was a skilled politician and known for his honesty. But in this early period there were trials and tribulations more daunting for the Prophet than presiding over feuds. The Muslim emigrants that came with Muhammad from Mecca were not skilled in agriculture, and Medina’s economy was almost solely based on crops of dates, cereals, and so forth. In an effort to pull their own weight and support themselves while living in Medina, the emigrants took to raiding Meccan caravans – another skill they lacked, being from a sedentary culture. Most of these raids were dismal failures, but with practice they began to accrue successes.

Quran

The Quran (meaning “recital” or “recitation”; also spelled Koran) is, for Muslims, the infallible word of God as it was communicated by the angel Gabriel to Muhammad. The text is composed of 114 chapters, or surahs, which contain the various revelations. The surahs are generally organized according to size, in order of decreasing length; the shorter surahs at the end of the book are some of the earlier revelations. Functioning as a source of moral and spiritual inspiration, the Quran’s teachings addressed the social ills of Arabia in Muhammad’s time. Treatment of orphans, women, and the underprivileged are addressed, along with the severe rampant corruption in Mecca.

... the Quran places the chief emphasis on the religious aspect of the troubles of Mecca. It calls on men to acknowledge the power and goodness of God their Creator and to worship Him. Thereby they will be denying the omnipotence and the omni-competence of the wealthy man. The Quran thus provides a corrective – a more satisfying corrective – to the ‘presumption’ and ‘pride in wealth’ which it regards as the root of the materialistic humanism underlying the social malaise of the times.¹¹

It must be remembered that the Quran was not assembled until decades after Muhammad’s death. Ever since, the Quran has been considered the superlative model of classical Arabic prose.

Also a matter of significance was Muhammad’s “break with the Jews.” Of the eleven or so clans that made up Medina, three were Jewish, and at one time had control of Yathrib. Though distinct by their adherence to Judaism, these Jews were probably indistinguishable from any other clan in Medina at the time.¹² It was with respect that Muhammad viewed Christians and Jews, recognizing them as “People of the Book.” Believing himself to be a continuation of the Abrahamic lineage – Abraham, Moses, Jesus – Muhammad looked to these Jews as potential supporters. Some indications of deference shown to these clans at the time were the observance of the Jewish fast of Yom Kippur, or the Day of Atonement, and Muhammad’s choice of Jerusalem as the Muslim qiblah, the direction in which one faced during prayer. But despite Muhammad’s efforts, the Jewish clans were never quite convinced of his prophethood and challenged the legitimacy of his preaching. Eventually, Muhammad would change the qiblah to Mecca (where it remains today) and exchange the fast of Yom Kippur for the month-long fast of Ramadan.

Ka’bah

In Islam's holiest city of Mecca, and in Mecca's holiest mosque – the Great Mosque – lies Islam's holiest object, the Ka'bah. Arabic for "cube," the Ka'bah predates Islam, previously serving as a place of pagan worship, and is believed to have been built by Adam, and then rebuilt by Abraham. When Muslims face Mecca to pray five times a day, it is toward the Ka'bah that they are facing.

Muhammad's break with the three Jewish clans was a political and strategic maneuver motivated by the dissent from these clans, along with the support they provided to a number of Muhammad's enemies. This rift would eventually result in the expulsion of two of them (the Qaynuqa and an-Nadir clans). The fate of the third, the Qurayzah clan, was rather worse. The men were executed and the women and children sold into slavery. Other much smaller groups of Jews were allowed to remain.

Some readers learning of this event may do so with raised eyebrows, thinking: "Aha! So that's the beginning of the conflict between the Jews and the Arabs!" Well, no. But first and foremost, this event concerning the Qurayzah clan is historically verified and cannot be ignored. However, it should be remembered that in seventh-century Arabia, tribal and clan warfare was quite common. Yet, by all accounts this sort of policy was rare for Muhammad. The whole purpose of his preaching was to unite the people of Arabia and move society away from this sort of barbarism. At the time, such acts in ancient Arabia were perpetrated with the general understanding that they might generate a response; attacks took the form of a challenge. Most instances where people were shown "mercy" were actually carried out to avoid retaliation. Muhammad, in this event, caused little shock in his brutality, but surprised everyone by his fearlessness of reprisal.

In March 628, Muhammad decided to make a pilgrimage to Mecca with roughly 1,500 men. They made their way to Hudaibiya, just north of Mecca, where they were met by a defensive Meccan military presence, acting under the assumption that Muhammad possessed hostile intentions. A truce was established between the two sides and the Muslims were allowed to return the following year for the pilgrimage. After the pilgrimage in 628, allies of Mecca attacked allies of Muhammad. Deeming this a breach of the Hudaibiya treaty, in January 630 Muhammad advanced on Mecca with a force of 10,000. Overwhelmed by this show of strength, Mecca allowed Muhammad to enter and occupy the city, which he did peacefully, meeting almost no resistance. Without Muhammad's insistence, most Meccans converted to Islam. With this major victory and a series of smaller ones, Muhammad's power grew exponentially. And by 630 Muhammad led the strongest military force in Arabia, now predominantly Islamic and unified with its capital in Medina.

By 632 Muhammad's health was failing, though he did manage to lead the pilgrimage to Mecca in that year. It would be his last and has come to be known as the "pilgrimage of farewell." On June 8, 632, in the presence of his wife, Aisha, Muhammad died. Abu-Bakr, Muhammad's best friend and Aisha's father, is quoted as saying: "O ye people, if anyone worships Muhammad, Muhammad is dead, but if anyone worships God, He is alive and dies not."¹³

THE ARAB EMPIRE

With the passing of Muhammad, his followers found themselves uncertain how to proceed.

Having no sons who lived past infancy, the Prophet was left without a successor. And leaving in place no system of administration or organization, the Muslim community needed someone to replace Muhammad. It was Abu-Bakr who was chosen to be the Prophet's successor, or caliph (which comes from khalifa in Arabic, meaning "to succeed").

The caliph was not a prophet and did not receive revelations. He was merely a leader of the community. Abu-Bakr (r. 632–634) was confronted almost exclusively with administrative and political issues, which grew quite difficult with the passing of Muhammad. With the solidity of the Muslim community quickly degenerating into chaos and infighting, Abu-Bakr and his successor Umar (r. 634–644) implemented a tried and true strategem: The best way to create solidarity among a population is to focus its attention outside itself. This was achieved by moving north to conquer lands held by the Byzantine and Persian empires. With the fighting that had been going on between the two empires, both were greatly weakened and their territories ripe for the picking. In a decade the Arab armies won control of Constantinople's Middle Eastern holdings: Palestine, Syria, Egypt, and Cyrenaica (a region in the eastern portion of modern-day Libya). The eventual fall of the Persian Empire would also add its provinces to the list of Arab acquisitions.

In the matter of a century, the Arab Empire stretched from Spain (its westernmost territory), across North Africa and the whole of the Middle East to the western border of China. Over the course of the Rashidun caliphate (comprised of the first four caliphs, known as "the rightly guided" caliphs) and two main dynasties, the Umayyad and the Abbasid (sometimes referred to as the High Caliphate),¹⁴ the Arab Empire retained its power for over six centuries. However, after the relatively unified rule of the Umayyads (661–750) and some 200 years into the Abbasid era (950), things were winding down and the empire was becoming fractured and disintegrated. The empire as it stood from Abu-Bakr to the tenth century is a story of frequent revolts, dissent, assassinations, and more revolts. But what happened culturally during this time was something quite noteworthy.

The invaders of the desert brought with them no tradition of learning, no heritage of culture, to the lands they conquered. In Syria, in Egypt, in al-'Iraq, in Persia, they sat as pupils at the feet of the peoples they subdued.¹⁵

Coming from a rather unsophisticated and simple, but not barbaric, style of living, the Arabs made their way into these foreign lands encountering highly cultured societies, happening upon classical literature, Hellenistic thought, Byzantine institutions, Roman law, Syriac scholarship, and Persian art.

At first these resources were appropriated directly, with little reshaping. Before long, however, they were more selectively utilized, combined into novel patterns that served as both resources and stimulus to creative Muslim scholarship. The result was not simply a montage of bits and pieces of disparate culture. It was a new creation with its own distinctive pattern, infused with a new spirit and expressing a new social order.¹⁶

The mission of the Muslims was not domination in the sense of one power moving in and exerting total control and subjugating the native populations. The Arabs instead entered Persia, Spain, Africa, and the Middle East and established a synthesis between their pan-Islamic intentions of expansion and the cultural and intellectual resources of the people they were conquering. Consequently, the diverse and varied societies spanning the territory of the empire came into contact with one another by virtue of being under the same rule. Music, art, science, and literature were no longer confined to a specific region, but instead contributed to a larger culture. With capitals in Cordoba in Spain, Cairo in Egypt, Damascus in Syria, and Baghdad in Iraq, these cities became centers of high culture, boasting achievements in science and art that were, at the time, unrivaled anywhere else in the world. It was this Arab Golden Age that would inspire and create the impetus for the European Renaissance.

3

The Crusades to the Ottoman Empire

Note: Phrases like “the Crusades” and “the Ottoman Empire” are commonly associated with high school and college history courses, of which you would probably rather not be reminded. Remaining sensitive to this I have endeavored to keep this chapter short and somewhat lively – though thousands of people being hacked to pieces doesn’t need much spicing up. Nevertheless, this chapter attempts to lay out in a quick and clear manner a huge expanse of history that connects the ancient with the modern.

THE CRUSADES (1095–1291)

Over the course of the second half of the first millennium, a nomadic people coming most likely from Central Asia and Mongolia entered Persia. Known as the Turks, they eventually made their way into Persia and the Middle East. During the expansion of the Arab Empire, the Turks, in their southern migration, came into contact with the Arabs; they were actually part of the Abbasid era discussed in the previous chapter, and quickly converted to Islam.¹

One of the more historically noteworthy Turkish tribes were the Seljuks. This dynasty, in 1044, defeated and supplanted the prior Ghaznavid dynasty, and with an initial alliance with the Abbasids eventually gained control of all the region covering modern-day Turkey, Syria, Palestine, Iraq, Iran, and Afghanistan. This rapid expansion of Seljuk control, however, unnerved the Byzantine emperor Alexius Comnenus. (Bear in mind that as the Seljuks expanded into modern-day Turkey, they were approaching Constantinople where the Byzantine Empire’s capital was located.) In 1095, Alexius contacted the pope in Rome, Urban II, with an appeal for help.

Alexius and Urban were anything but friends, but Pope Urban saw an advantage in Rome coming to the aid of the Byzantine emperor. Along with saving the day and rescuing Christians in the east, as well as opening up Palestine and the routes of pilgrimage, Urban could establish the supremacy of the papacy over the entirety of the Christian Church.

Later in the same year Urban gave a speech at the Council of Clermont calling upon all Christians, rich and poor, to leap to the aid of the eastern Christians. Though what he said precisely is unknown (there are accounts but they were written years later) it is safe to assume the speech was a masterpiece of oratory and persuasion. Appealing to a range of motives – from religious to racist – the pope cultivated a mass hatred for the “wicked race” of Muslims and urged that the Holy Land be regained and the infidels exterminated. Fired with a zeal for honor, spiritual salvation, acquisition of wealth, and adventure, the crowds cried “Deus volt!” (God wills it).

In the following year, 1096, an army of 15,000 knights headed for Constantinople. After turning back the encroaching Turks, most of the army continued with the original plan of marching on to Jerusalem. The crusaders took Jerusalem in a six-week siege, in 1099. An account by one crusader offers a glimpse:

The amount of blood that they shed on that day is incredible.... Some of our men (and this was more merciful) cut off the heads of their enemies; others shot them with arrows, so that they fell from towers; others tortured them longer by casting them into flames. Piles of heads, hands, feet were to be seen in the streets of the city.... It was a just and splendid judgment of God that this place should be filled with the blood of unbelievers, since it had suffered so long from their blasphemies.²

Killing Muslims and Jews – men, women, and children alike – the First Crusade managed to drive back the infidels, or “Saracens” as the crusaders referred to Muslims and Arabs, from Constantinople and liberate the Holy City of Jerusalem. A little over half a century later, the Turks launched a counteroffensive to regain Jerusalem, and under the leadership of the legendary Saladin (Salah al-Din in Arabic), who was of Kurdish decent, took the Holy City back in 1187.

After the First Crusade there were countless other expeditions, only a few of which have actually been enumerated by historians. The Second Crusade (1147–49), encouraged by the French monk St Bernard of Clairvaux, was short-lived and resulted in a pitiful attempt to take Damascus; in a five-day siege it was over. The Third Crusade (1189–92) was inspired by Saladin’s recapture of Jerusalem. Preached by Pope Gregory VIII but led by the French King Philip II and England’s Richard I (also known as Richard the Lionheart), this crusade attempted to reach Jerusalem, but went to and defeated Acre (a town in northwestern modern-day Israel) in 1191. Richard and Saladin, between whom there was reported mutual respect, then signed a treaty that lasted five years.

The Fourth Crusade (1202–4) is a story of the crusaders planning to make their way to Egypt via the Mediterranean Sea. However, their intentions were sidetracked in Venice, and the crusaders instead helped the Venetians attack their rivals – who, incidentally, were Christian. After doing so, the crusaders, along with the Venetians, further changed their objectives and stormed Constantinople. In a somewhat peculiar turn of events, the crusaders were attacking the very place that had appealed to their forefathers for help!

The year 1212 witnessed the involvement of children in what is called the Children’s Crusade. A peasant boy by the name of Stephen of Cloyes gathered approximately 30,000 French and German kids and set out from Marseilles. Vulnerable to ruthless merchants, the children were promised free passage to the Holy Land, but instead were sent to slave markets in North Africa. A second children’s crusade that came out of Germany suffered a similar fate.

The Fifth Crusade (1218–21) took place in Egypt and, after a modicum of initial success, failed; this was to be the last crusade where the papacy played an active role. The Sixth Crusade (1228–29) was not much of a crusade at all, and instead ended up being a diplomatic visit by the Holy Roman Emperor Frederick II, resulting in a truce and a partial surrender of Jerusalem and Bethlehem. However, the Muslims soon reoccupied both places. A treaty in 1244 restored Christian possession, but Egyptian Muslims and some Turkish allies took Jerusalem once again, leading to the Seventh Crusade.

Another attempt at Egypt, this time by King Louis IX of France, resulted in his own capture, and release. Deciding he had not had enough, Louis led another expedition in 1270 – the Eighth Crusade – this time to Tunisia in North Africa. Upon his arrival plague began to wipe out his troops, and eventually him along with it. Aside from an attempt by Prince Edward at coming to Louis's assistance – a bit too late – Louis's Crusade is considered the last. By 1291 the Christians had lost the last of their strongholds (Acre). Some low-key attempts at regaining various territories continued for a short while, but by 1291 what we know as the period of the Crusades was over.

Aside from initial and temporary success, all subsequent seven Crusades resulted in failure. What the crusaders brought home with them, on the other hand, were the cultural and scientific achievements of the Middle East. While the Arabs, Persians, and Jews were making breakthroughs in art and science, Europe was mired in the stagnancy of the Middle Ages. Upon the return of the crusaders to their homelands, an impulse was created that would in time result in the Renaissance back in Europe.

For the Muslims, victory failed to outweigh some of the costs – known as a pyrrhic victory. Two hundred years of warfare had left its imprint on the region. Another aspect of the expensive triumph of the Muslims was their vulnerability to other potential invading forces, though it did increase cultural cohesion and willingness to resist. While the Crusades were winding down, and the region being sufficiently softened up from years of strife, the Muslims were visited by another foreign presence – one without pretense of purpose.

THE MONGOL INVASION

During the initial years of the Fifth Crusade (1218–21), the Muslim Middle East suffered another bloody invasion, this time by the Mongols and their leader, Genghis Khan. A nomadic people from north of the Gobi Desert (located in modern-day Mongolia, north of China), the Mongols were originally tribal hunters and herders, but in the early thirteenth century formed a confederation under the leadership of Genghis (also spelled Chingis, Chingiz, Jenghis, and Jenghiz, though the spelling of his real name, Temujin, is relatively constant). Though preoccupied with taking over China, he was sidetracked by a plea for help from the Turks in modern-day Kyrgyzstan (northeast of Afghanistan). They had fallen under the control of a rival Mongol confederation, the Kara-Khitay. After dealing with this group, Genghis's momentum inspired a wholesale invasion of Southwest Asia and Persia. What ensued was genocidal slaughter and destruction of entire cities and populations.

They slaughtered 700,000 inhabitants of Merv; their engineers broke the dams near Gurganj to flood the city after it had been taken; they poured molten gold down the throat of a Muslim governor; they carried off thousands of Muslim artisans to Mongolia as slaves, most of them dying on the way; they stacked the heads of Nishapur's men, women, and children in pyramids; and they even killed dogs and cats in the streets.³

After Genghis's death in 1227, one of his grandsons, Hulegu, decided to move the conquest further west with the intent of driving his forces all the way through the Middle East as far as Egypt.

In 1256 Hulegu ploughed through the territories of Iran, Iraq, and Syria. By 1258 the Mongols had reached Baghdad and laid waste to libraries, mosques, and centuries worth of physical history. Estimates vary, but it is safe to say that a million people were slaughtered during the siege (though Christians and Jews were spared). Along with the destruction of the city and many of its people, the caliphate in Baghdad was also toppled: the Abbasid caliph and all the males of his house, after surrendering, were rolled into carpets and trampled to death by horses.

The stench of the corpses throughout the city finally drove Hulegu and company out of Baghdad. The city would never recover.

Again, momentum carried the Mongols toward the Mediterranean and Egypt. In 1259–60 Hulegu's forces took the Syrian cities of Aleppo and Damascus, with Jerusalem next on the list. However, during the years the Mongols spent moving westward, a powerful new group known as the Mamluks was rising in Egypt. Originally, the Mamluks (meaning "slave" or "owned men") were a military force raised by the Abbasid caliphs of the ninth century by forcing non-Muslim boys into military training. Yet, they grew into a formidable power in Egypt. Moving on Jerusalem the Mongols were stopped in their tracks by the Mamluks, meeting defeat at the Battle of Ayn Jalut in September 1260. Thus the Mamluks became the masters of Syria and Palestine, while Hulegu withdrew to Iraq and Persia. While in control of Syria and Palestine the Mamluk forces drove the last of the crusaders out in 1291, and remained in power until 1517.

THE OTTOMAN EMPIRE (1299–1922)

The genesis of the Ottoman Empire took place between the disintegration of the Byzantine Empire, the disintegration of Seljuk power, and the invasion of the Mongols. With the Byzantine Empire reeling from the unexpected effects of the Fourth Crusade (when the crusaders attacked Constantinople), and the Seljuks' defeat in 1243 by the Mongols, tribes of warrior nomads called ghazis slipped through the cracks into Anatolia (modern-day Turkey).

In an attempt to escape the Mongols (as well as seek material gain and expand the boundaries of Islam) these ghazi nomads occupied eastern and central Anatolia, and then formed principalities in the contested border regions west and north. One of the weaker and less significant of these was the principality run by Osman I (r. 1280–1324?).

Located right at the edge of the Byzantine defense perimeter, Osman's principality was engaged in constant battle with the empire. After a number of military successes it started attracting the attention of other tribes that soon pledged their loyalty. Osman's growing military might created the needed conditions for vast expansion, which is exactly what he and his son, Orhan (r. 1324?–60), initiated. Those belonging to the principality of Osman and Orhan were to become known as Osmanlis, or Ottomans.

Over the next number of rulers, or sultans, the Ottomans conquered the Balkans in Eastern Europe. In 1453, a watershed year in Ottoman history, Constantinople was finally, after many previous attempts, taken by Sultan Mehmet II (r. 1451–81). Constantinople would henceforth be called Istanbul. Through vast reconstruction programs instituted by Mehmet II and his successors, the city was restored to the splendor of its best years under Byzantine rule.

Under the sultanates of Selim I (r. 1512–20) and Suleyman the Magnificent (r. 1520–66), the Ottoman Empire underwent its greatest expansion. By the end of Suleyman's rule, the Ottoman Empire covered the territories of Hungary, Yugoslavia, North Africa, Egypt, Syria (including what is now Israel and Palestine), Iraq, Iran, and the western rim of Arabia. Suleyman the Magnificent's sultanate (the tenth) marks the zenith of the Ottoman Empire.

By the sixteenth century the Ottoman Empire was the largest and most powerful empire in the world. Far from homogeneous, the empire consisted not just of Turks, but also Arabs, Armenians, Greeks, and Slavs. Istanbul, by this time, was a cosmopolitan melting pot of 700,000 inhabitants representing all three monotheistic faiths: 58 percent were Muslim, 32 percent were Christian, and 10 percent were Jewish.⁴ With this broad range of cultural and religious diversity, the Ottoman Empire chalked a good deal of its success up to the flexibility of its administrative policies. Management methods like the millet system allowed the different religious groups a significant amount of autonomy. Millets were communities of non-Muslims granted the freedom to continue their faith-specific policies, regarding education and legal issues, with minimum interference. The relative autonomy reduced the likelihood of resistance; even the religious leaders of the various communities were allowed to remain in place, but were assigned the responsibility of being tax farmers for the Ottomans. The top Ottoman priorities were taxes and stability, and this system yielded both.

The sixteenth and seventeenth centuries marked the beginning of the empire's decline. The international tide was changing, which forced the Ottomans into new and unfamiliar territory. Economic competition with neighboring powers, in particular Europe, created new patterns of commerce and trade that diminished the hitherto economic independence of the Ottoman Turks to a state of utter dependence. (Europe had undergone steady and significant development from the Renaissance onward, in time arriving at the Industrial Revolution.) Along with the external changes facing the Ottoman leadership, the empire encountered challenges from within. Less effective sultans, deterioration of institutional integrity – corruption, merit-based systems replaced by nepotism – and decentralization of the power structure served only to weaken the empire politically, militarily, and economically.

Attempts at reform were undertaken to westernize various institutions, including the military. Most notable of the reformers were sultans Selim III (r. 1789–1807) and Mahmud II (r. 1808–39). Shortly after Mahmud II, the era of intense reformism known as the Tanzimat took hold. During this period a new literary movement involving poetry and journalism gave rise to a group (more in name than in substance) called the Young Ottomans. The Young Ottomans were interested in reforms that reconciled the westernizing attempts of the Tanzimat with Ottoman/Islamic traditional foundations. They then called for a constitution. The Ottoman Constitution of 1876, however, was suspended before the ink was dry due to, among other things, a Russian invasion. Shortly thereafter, a number of opposition groups formed a movement called the Young Turks. This movement and its secret society called the Committee of Union and Progress (CUP) inspired a coup in 1908 that restored the 1876 constitution and eventually overthrew the government. Despite good intentions the Young Turks inherited, but were not able to handle, internal instability, external strife including large losses of territory (especially in Eastern Europe), and two coups – one that removed the CUP from power and one that restored it. Ottoman pursuit of reform, democracy, and statehood was finished. With World War I a few years away, the 600-year-old empire was soon to go the way of every empire before it.⁵

II Origins

Chapters 4 and 5, addressing Zionism and Palestine, will set the conflict's stage by examining the two involved groups. First, we will look at the tribulations and persecution of Europe's Jews and the resultant birth of Zionism. Secondly, a description of Palestine between the years of 1882 to 1914 will help us glean a sense of what things were like at the twilight of the Ottoman Empire: the political climate, the people, and how they lived. Chapter 6 then traces the developments over World War I and World War II that gave rise to what we will finally arrive at in Part III: the conflict.

4

Jewish Persecution and Zionism

The world resounds with outcries against the Jews, and these outcries have awakened the slumbering idea.

*Theodor Herzl, The Jewish State*¹

THE TRIBULATIONS OF EUROPEAN JEWRY

In Europe, the emerging concept of nationalism was also taking hold of Jewish communities; at first in Eastern Europe, but eventually spreading from London to Moscow. Recall from Chapter 1 that the Jews were spread throughout much of Europe after being expelled by the Romans in the second century. “The distinguishing characteristic of the Jews,” historian David Vital succinctly states, “has been their Exile.”² Endeavoring to maintain cultural identity while living in a diaspora, an element of Jewish consciousness for 1,900 years has been to return to Eretz-Israel (Land of Israel), or Zion.

From a theological perspective the Jews were cast out of Eretz-Israel and into exile for transgressions against Yahweh. Therefore, some believe the Jews are serving a penance and awaiting redemption from God. Jewish redemption and return to Eretz-Israel can only, as a matter of course, be divinely provided on Judgment Day, when the Messiah comes to bring peace to all nations. The return from exile has survived as a religious notion, but the idea of a homeland was never considered an actual political ideology until the nineteenth century. That said, as the above quotation by Theodor Herzl (more on him later) indicates, some Jews in the late 1800s began to see a potential political reality in the Promised Land.

To get an idea of the evolution of European Jewry during the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, we can more or less look at Europe along its Eastern/Western axis.

To the Jew as a man – everything: to Jews as a nation – nothing.

Count Stanislas Clermont-Tonnerre to the French Assembly, October 12, 1789

As a result of the French Revolution (1789) and its Declaration of the Rights of Man, France became a place where Jews were included as citizens under the “preservation of the natural and imprescriptible rights of ... Liberty, Property, Safety, and Resistance to Oppression.”³ Over the next half-century Western Europe offered the possibility of assimilation (blending into the surrounding culture) for Jewish people. Many Western Jews chose this route and assimilated into the cultures among which they lived, becoming more European and less culturally distinct. This phenomenon greatly increased social and legal equality, and reduced suspicion toward and xenophobia (fear of the foreign) of Jews, though sporadic instances of anti-Semitic violence persisted. Jews were sometimes still viewed as aliens and used as scapegoats for social, political, and economic maladies. All in all, things were better for Western Jews than for Eastern Jews.

In Eastern Europe, where the large majority of world Jewry (75 percent) was located, Jews were faring far worse. The change in philosophy in Central and Western Europe did not take root in Russia and Eastern Europe. With the partitioning of Poland (1772–95) between Austria, Prussia, and Russia, Russia’s Jewish population was greatly expanded by those inherited from the annexed territory. According to historian Howard M. Sachar:

Anti-Semitism

The term “anti-Semitic” was coined around this time (1879) by the German journalist Wilhelm Marr. The term indicates a shift in thinking; from that of religious hatred to that of racist hatred. So even if Jews fully merged into the surrounding culture and played by the rules, they were still viewed as Jews biologically. But, as was covered in Chapter 1, a Semite is someone who belongs to a particular language group, one that includes a variety of peoples – including Arabs. So the terms “anti-Semite” and “anti-Semitic” are technically misnomers.

To the tsarist government, no less than to the backward, largely illiterate native peasantry, the Jews were regarded in terms of their medieval stereotype: as Christ killers, well poisoners, or at best as usurious traders and parasitic middlemen.⁴

Confronted with having to deal with this influx of undesired people, the government, in an effort to keep Jews from infiltrating mainland society, decided to concentrate them in Russia-controlled Poland. Passed in 1791 (but formally instituted in 1794) the Pale of Settlement was created. Essentially a vast ghetto stretching from the Black Sea to the Baltic Sea, Jews were confined to certain areas and cities within this territory and endured severe restrictions. One of the most brutal aspects of life in the Pale was its military conscription ukase (edict). These recruitment policies ordered Jewish children as young as eight to be taken from their parents by press-gangs and forced into 25 years of military service – more or less a death sentence.⁵

The reign of Czar Alexander II (r. 1855–81), however, saw a relaxation of governmental policies and the institution of reforms that benefited the Jews as well as the Russian citizenry. This period of slight liberal reform ushered in a movement of Jewish enlightenment known as the Haskalah. With students being able to attend university in Moscow, a minor easing of Pale restrictions, and the birth of a literary movement among Jewish students and intellectuals, Russian Jewry began to examine its own culture more closely. Issues of modernity, traditional religiosity, cultural insularity, and Gentile (non-Jewish) society, especially Western culture, came to the fore. Jews began to question and reassess their cultural role. “Be a Jew at home and a man in the street” became a slogan that enshrined the prevailing sentiment of the Haskalah poets and writers.⁶

There was much discussion and published philosophizing about the pros and cons of assimilation and secular modernity, as well as more traditional Torah-based solutions to the plight and problems of Jewish people. Though there were improvements under Alexander II (including the termination of conscription of children), life was far from easy and anti-Jewish sentiment was a fixture of Russian thinking, from the ruling elite to the peasantry. Then, in 1881, things got worse.

In March, a group of young revolutionaries assassinated Alexander II. The reign of Alexander III brought a shockwave of anti-Semitism along with it. Blamed for the assassination, although only one of the assassins was Jewish, the Jews suffered severe reinstatement of restrictions, expulsion from Moscow, strict quotas for students, and transference from the countryside to the already overcrowded city slums. Aside from political backlash the Russian peasantry, with tacit support from the government, also acted out its contempt with waves of attacks and riots known as pogroms. These pogroms were acts of profound violence that shook Russian Jewry to its roots. A dispatch describing one such attack that took place on Passover, April 1882, reads as follows:

On the tenth, at three o'clock in the afternoon, the riot began; the Jewish inhabitants ... prepared to defend themselves; whereupon the municipal authorities had them dispersed by troops who beat them with rifle-butts. On the eleventh, at eight o'clock in the morning, 600 peasants from the surrounding country recommenced the attack and maintained it without further obstacle. It was a scene of pillage, murder, arson, and rape to make one tremble with horror; 700 Jews were injured, 40 seriously, 3 were killed [the figures were later corrected: 211 injured of whom 39 seriously, 9 killed]; girls were raped; all houses inhabited by Jews, with 16 exceptions, were demolished [later corrected: 976 houses, 253 shops, and 34 public houses]; all household furniture was broken or burned; everything destroyed. The Jews are dying of hunger.⁷

A four-year period of fear and violence more or less totally destroyed any hopes or illusions of emancipation and equality. The harsh restrictions of the Pale, anti-Semitic hatred, attacks, and the attendant poverty, misery, and fear that went along with this treatment, brought Russian Jewry to the psychological brink. From the beginning of the pogrom years to the turn of the century, hundreds of thousands of Jews emigrated from Russia to Western Europe, South America, Palestine, and to a large extent the United States. Escape seemed the only viable option under such circumstances. In the background, however, the notion of escape was being focused and tempered with thoughts of nationalism. Russia's implied hopes that "one-third will die out, one-third will leave the country, and one-third will completely dissolve in the surrounding population" had indeed awakened the slumbering idea.⁸

THE BIRTH OF ZIONISM

Jewish desire for a national homeland was motivated, almost exclusively, by what they suffered and endured in Russia, and this desire for a safe haven state is the very essence of Zionism. The term "Zionism," coined by the Austrian author and publicist Nathan Birnbaum, did not become the formal label for this idea until the mid-1880s; the concept of Zionism, as an actual political strategy, began to germinate several years earlier.

As early as 1839 a rabbi from near Belgrade by the name of Yehuda Alkalai published a text entitled Darchai Noam (Pleasant Paths) in which he propounded the colonization of the Holy Land. A contemporary of Alkalai's from East Prussia, Rabbi Zvi Hirsch Kalischer, published similar writings regarding redemption through action. In 1862 a German Jew by the name of Moses Hess (a classmate of Karl Marx, incidentally) reacted to the recurrent anti-Semitism around him by authoring Rome and Jerusalem. Now a classic of Zionist literature, it was not significantly considered until Zionism was fully developed years later. But its thesis concluded that Jewish return to the Land of Israel was requisite for true emancipation.

"Zion"

The background and origin of the term "Zion" is somewhat obscure. The name refers to both the city of Jerusalem as well as the hill on which it was built. In the Bible the term is mentioned in both Old and New Testaments, such as Mount Zion. As the Encyclopaedia Britannica states: "Mount Zion is the place where Yahweh, the God of Israel, dwells (Isaiah 8:18; Psalm 74:2), the place where he is king (Isaiah 24:23) and where he has installed his king, David (Psalm 2:6). It is thus the seat of the action of Yahweh in history."⁹ Zion can also denote heaven and the Jewish people.

Aside from these initial instances, the longing for statehood did not become pronounced until the pogrom years (1881–84). With the crushing blow of these years on Russian Jews, the Haskalah became a distant memory, its light all but snuffed out. Nevertheless, a number of students, writers, and intellectuals who remained motivated decided to apply its achievements to a desperately practical end.

By the 1870s Zionist groups and clubs began to sprout up throughout the Pale, such as the Hovevei Zion (Lovers of Zion) – later a confederation called Hibbat Zion (The Love of Zion). These circles engaged in various activities, social and political, but the ideological substrate of these organizations was singular and to the point: living in Russia is intolerable and the solution is Eretz-Israel. Hibbat Zion would eventually come under the leadership of the physician Leo Pinsker, who in 1882 published Autoemancipation. Pinsker's text was the first substantive analysis and formulation of the Jewish question, suggesting that the world's anti-Semitism was incurable and that a homeland was the only vehicle of deliverance – though he was not insistent on Palestine, and suggested other possibilities including North America. Regardless, Autoemancipation became the manifesto of the Hibbat Zion and was fairly well received, placing Pinsker at the heart of the burgeoning movement.

Another group working at around the same time was the BILU, an acronym from the biblical passage Isaiah 2:5: "O house of Jacob, come ye and let us walk in the light of the Lord."¹⁰ A group of students from Kharkov, Ukraine, the BILU in 1882 organized and committed to establishing agricultural settlement communes in Palestine. Fourteen members set out for Eretz-Israel that same year, but achieved very limited success and ended up returning to Europe, ultimately in failure.

Also at this time (1882 was a big year) a large wave of immigration called the First Aliyah ("Ascent") occurred. Between 1882 and 1903, 25,000 Jews entered Palestine. Though some were motivated ideologically, most were simply fleeing Russia and Eastern Europe and headed for the larger cities as opposed to settlements in the hinterland. By and large, Zionism was just getting off the ground and lacked any real political organization. What movements and groups did exist were comprised of small numbers with only a modicum of planning and strategy, and less than a modicum of financing. Some of the settlements were propped up solely by the philanthropy of Western Jews, wealthy men like Moses Montefiore and financier Baron Edmond de Rothschild. Zionism up until the 1880s lacked the cohesion and the engine of a full-blown political movement that would give sufficient force to Zionism's goals, but a 30,000-word pamphlet published in 1896 changed all that.

THEODOR HERZL AND POLITICAL ZIONISM

Oddly enough, the one who would end up gluing it all together and giving Zionism a unified voice and a politically structured agenda came not out of Russia or Eastern Europe, but Austria.

Born in Budapest, Hungary, in 1860 to an assimilated and well-to-do banking family, Theodor Herzl grew up in liberal European environs. In his late teens, he and his family moved to Vienna, where he attended university and became a lawyer. Disillusioned with the study of law, Herzl became interested in journalism, eventually taking a position as Paris correspondent at the prestigious Austrian paper, Neue Freie Presse. (Herzl was also something of a playwright, but never garnered much attention in that endeavor.)

For many years Herzl was unfamiliar with the plight of Russian Jewry or the fledgling Zionist movements that were being preached and practiced, his concern being European Jewry. Herzl's contemplation of this matter grew into obsession, and then the Dreyfus Affair brought his feelings and thoughts on the issue to a head. Captain Alfred Dreyfus, a French Jew and officer in the French army, was arrested in 1894 for selling military intelligence to the Germans. The case became a conflagration in French society, and anti-Semitism in liberal France came to the surface. Herzl, covering the event as a journalist, was most moved by French mobs shouting "À mort les Juifs!" (Death to the Jews). Dreyfus was convicted and sentenced to life imprisonment on Devil's Island, a French penal colony off the northeast coast of South America and a former leper colony. It was not until 1899 that Dreyfus was given a presidential pardon, and not until seven years later that he was fully vindicated and allowed to resume his post. But the effect the affair had on France was immense, and the effect it had on Herzl equally so.

Herzl began work on formalizing a solution to Jewish discrimination, and, in 1896, produced The Jewish State (Der Judenstaat). It was a short pamphlet (under one hundred pages) that spelled out in style and force of conviction what would become the principal statement of Zionism. Though not asserting anything conceptually innovative or new, Herzl was putting a face on the cause.¹¹ What was unique was an assimilated European intellectual promoting the notion of the Jews removing themselves from their situation. For Herzl, and many others, it was an incurable and hopeless situation, one that gave rise to an "inescapable conclusion."¹² In Herzl's words:

A nation is everywhere a great child, which can certainly be educated; but its education would, even in most favorable circumstances, occupy such a vast amount of time that we could, as already mentioned, remove our own difficulties by other means long before the process was accomplished.¹³

On particular issues Herzl diverged from "traditional" Zionist groups like Hibbat Zion. His strategy was to proceed diplomatically and seek the support and cooperation of the power elite and the wealthy, Jewish and non-Jewish alike. Rather than trickle-immigration, an international avowal and acknowledgment should be in order to initiate mass settlement. Moreover, Herzl was not totally dedicated to Palestine and was open to the possibility of Argentina as a potential Jewish homeland. Irrespective of these differences, Zionists were still in support of Herzl and the program he had formulated, coupled with the increased exposure of The Jewish State, which was being smuggled into Russia in defiance of its censorship. Herzl's name and legend were growing. On August 29, 1897, a congress was called to assemble in Basel, Switzerland, to lay the foundation of a Zionist organization.

Akin to a town hall meeting, the congress crowded into an auditorium and, at the end of three days of speeches, reports, and arguments, a definitive program was penned for the newly formed World Zionist Organization:

The aim of Zionism is to create for the Jewish people a home in Palestine secured by public law. The Congress contemplates the following means to the attainment of this end.

1. The promotion, on suitable lines, of the colonization of Palestine by Jewish agricultural and industrial workers.
2. The organization and binding together of the whole of Jewry by means of appropriate institutions, local and international, in accordance with the laws of each country.
3. The strengthening and fostering of Jewish national sentiment and consciousness.
4. Preparatory steps towards obtaining government consent, where necessary, to the attainment of the aim of Zionism.¹⁴

The declaration of principles, known as the Basel Declaration, clearly stated the intentions of the congress while at the same time trying not to create concern or panic about a “Jewish State” in Ottoman Palestine; the word “home” was used to prevent, or at least allay, those fears. In any case, the congress was deemed a success, especially by Herzl, who had this to say in his diaries: “Were I to sum up the Basel Congress in a word – which I shall guard against pronouncing publicly – it would be this: At Basel I founded the Jewish State.”¹⁵

With the foundation laid and everyone on board, the issues that emerged were securing capital and international recognition for a charter in Palestine. Herzl embarked on a diplomatic tour to address this small but daunting list of needs. Trips to Constantinople were made in an attempt to strike a deal with Sultan Abdul Hamid. Looking for Ottoman approval for Zionist settlements in Palestine, Herzl, in 1901, extended the offer of helping the sultan with Ottoman debt. The meetings proved fruitless. The following year, Herzl turned to the British for support, only to be presented with the option of settling in a territory in British East Africa. The British colonial secretary, Joseph Chamberlain, offered “Uganda,” which was in reality the area that would later become Kenya. Herzl considered it, though mostly in order not to jeopardize his relationship with the British. News of the offer, however, caused not a little tumult in the Sixth Zionist Congress. It split Zionists everywhere into polarized camps: one urging practicality, and the other idealism – a home in Palestine. All hell broke loose, and Herzl desperately tried to put the pieces back together. But time ran out for Theodor Herzl, who died on July 3, 1904, at the age of 44.

Though never achieving the international support he hoped for, Herzl left the World Zionist Organization in a good position. With a bank established, and the direction, momentum, and ideological clarity that the group needed, the Zionist movement was now a unified and organized political force. The Seventh Zionist Congress of 1905 picked up where it left off (after putting to bed the Uganda issue) and forged ahead resolute.

5

Palestine

FILASTIN (ARABIC FOR “PALESTINE”)

From the dawn of civilization to the fast-approaching period of the modern era and World War I, we have seen the word Israel used in connection with a kingdom that developed in the Levant. Later, we saw the term used in conjunction with the longed-for Jewish homeland in scripture and its appropriation by Zionist ideology regarding the actual establishment of a homeland in Eretz-Israel. With the name Israel we have established some familiarity. The name Palestine, however, needs more clarification.

Determining the what and the when of Palestine can be an ambiguous issue. Looking at a modern map one would have trouble finding a country labeled Palestine. Even if you had a map from the second half of the nineteenth century you would still experience the same difficulty. On top of that, it is not until 1922 that the name Palestine is conferred with any “official” status, which we will get to in the next chapter. So what is all this talk of Palestine about? As for the derivation and origination of the name, the Encyclopaedia Britannica says the following:

The word Palestine derives from Philistia, the name given by Greek writers to the land of the Philistines, who in the 12th century BC occupied a small pocket of land on the southern coast, between modern Tel Aviv–Yafo [Tel Aviv–Jaffa] and Gaza. The name was revived by the Romans in the 2nd century AD in “Syria Palaestina,” designating the southern portion of the province of Syria. After Roman times the name had no official status until after World War I and the end of Ottoman rule....¹

Into the late-Ottoman years, Palestine was not a singular administrative geopolitical entity. Its organization changed over the course of the nineteenth century, but by the end of the century it was divided into three districts, or sanjaks: Jerusalem, Nablus, and Acre, all of which had been a part of the vilayet (governorate) of Syria. These names correspond to towns that can certainly be located on a map, but in the 1880s they pertained also to districts named after the towns. Jerusalem became an independent sanjak, and those of Nablus and Acre were transferred to the new vilayet of Beirut. So until World War I, southern Palestine was under the administration of Jerusalem, while the north was controlled by Beirut. But these divisions notwithstanding, the whole of the territory west of the Jordan River and south of the vilayet of Beirut was referred to as “Palestine.” All the concerned groups in our discussion – Arabs, Jews, and Ottoman officials – referred to the geographic area as Palestine, with the Ottoman government using the term Arz-i Filistin (the “Land of Palestine”) in their official correspondence.²

During the turn of the century, however, things were beginning to change in the sanjaks. At the twilight of the Ottoman Empire, and the years leading up to 1914, thoughts of European-style nationalism were starting to swirl among the Arab communities. It is important to remember that our present-day concept of nationality – that is, a group of people who live within internationally recognized borders, acknowledge the same flag, use the same currency, carry the same passport – was unknown to the various tribes, confederations, and empires of the millennia covered so far. According to scholar Neville J. Mandel:

Nationalism in the European sense was almost unknown among the Arabs at the end of the nineteenth century. Personal loyalties were therefore to family and religion and, at another level, either to the Ottoman Empire (probably a somewhat abstract concept for the most) or to the much more concrete framework of town or village. In the years before 1914 a discrete Palestinian “patriotism” (rather than a full nationalism) emerged, in large part as a reaction to Zionism.³

This sense of nationalism deepened over time as a result of the culture’s evolution, in particular, the development of the region’s trade and commerce, and its subsequent engagement with Western European markets. Palestinian Arabs began to look further than their villages and farms, and started to think and feel collectively. As the years progressed toward World War I the developing Palestinian identity was met with increasing changes in landholding patterns, an issue that lay at the very center of that identity.

THE LAND

For the most part, life in Palestine during the thirty or so years between 1882 and 1914 was much like it had been for centuries: farming was how a living was made. With a small minority in the cities, most Palestinians lived a rural life where fellahin (peasant laborers) tended to their fields as a means of feeding their families. Olives, cotton, grains, melons, citrus – including the legendary oranges of Jaffa – are some of the crops that the fellahin cultivated, harvested, and sent to market.

For generations these peasant families worked the land as a cooperative, practicing usufruct, or communal ownership. Yet, as mentioned, in the mid-nineteenth century change was upon the Ottoman Empire. In an attempt to stabilize the empire, especially in the Arab provinces where revenue was being lost in mismanagement, the Tanzimat principles (see Chapter 3) were applied to Syria and Palestine with increasing determination. The Ottoman Land Code of 1858 was one measure taken to confront this loss of revenue.

In an effort to regulate landholdings, the new code demanded that land be attached to a clear title or deed of ownership, thus ensuring a direct and easy system of taxation. Though this policy was instituted slowly, over the course of decades, it eventually had a profound effect on landholding patterns in the region. As peasants often could not withstand the imposed tax burden, the fellahin frequently registered their lands with wealthy notables and village shaykhs, who would then in turn pay the taxes. Doing so also kept a family’s name off the tax rolls, the means by which the Ottomans used to find and conscript children into the military. All the same, the fellahin continued farming with the presumption that their rights to the land had not changed – registration was thought of merely as a formality. Though some of the new landowners were local Palestinian landlords, and occasionally fellahin, most were absentee landlords, and of these most were non-Palestinian; many from this group were Christian merchants and notables from Beirut, along with some Europeans.

Eventually, however, it started to become apparent that this registration was not just so much paperwork. The fellahin claim to the land was caught in a lose–lose predicament: register your family and risk losing the land owing to insufficient means to pay your taxes, or have a landlord register for you and risk losing the land through purchase to a third party. With the Zionist movement in high gear and making its way to Palestine, a motivated and willing third party was soon to arrive, namely, European and Russian Jews.

JEWISH–ZIONIST IMMIGRATION

A land without a people for a people without a land.

*Zionist slogan*⁴

Before Zionist immigrants began to arrive in 1882, a small minority population of Jews already resided in Palestine, some of whom had been there as long as any of the native Arabs.

*Note: On the eve of Zionist immigration, there were roughly 400,000 Muslims, 43,000 Christians, and 15,000 Jews living in Palestine as Ottoman citizens, non-Jews making up 96 percent of the total population.*⁵

The two main Jewish groups living in Palestine at the time (mainly in the towns) were the Sephardim and the Ashkenazim, together constituting the Old Yishuv (“old settlement”).⁶ The Sephardic Jews were Arabic-speaking Ottoman citizens who were integrated into the culture and, for all intents and purposes, had decent relations with the native Christians and Muslims. The Ashkenazim, on the other hand, were not altogether integrated into the surrounding culture (though some spoke Arabic) and consisted mostly of deeply religious Europeans who came to Palestine to pray as well as die. Ashkenazic Jews probably had a more difficult time being accepted. Jews in general were seen as second-class citizens regardless, though on the average they fared far better in Muslim countries than in Christian ones. What the Ashkenazim and the Sephardim shared in common at the dawn of the twentieth century, however, was a concern about Zionist immigration. Both groups feared the unsettling of their places in Palestinian society that would be precipitated by massive influxes of Russian and European Jews.

The First Aliyah (1882–1903), as we covered in Chapter 4, saw the immigration of 25,000 Jews into Palestine. But this group was mostly made up of people who were far more interested in parting company with Russia than anything ideological. As much as half would leave Palestine upon arriving, observing the lack of developed land and opportunity.⁷ Many of the immigrants were surprised to find little cultivable land available, on the one hand, and the presence of another culture on the other. After a three-month stay in Palestine in 1891, Ahad Ha’am (pen name of Asher Ginzberg), a prominent Eastern European Jewish essayist and Zionist leader, wrote the following in a piece entitled “Truth from the Land of Palestine”:

We abroad are used to believing that Eretz Israel is now almost totally desolate, a desert that is not sowed, and that anyone who wishes to purchase land there may come and purchase as much as he desires. But in truth this is not the case. Throughout the country it is difficult to find fields that are not sowed. Only sand dunes and stony mountains that are not fit to grow anything but fruit trees – and this is only after hard labor and great expense of clearing and reclamation – only these are not cultivated.⁸

The Second Aliyah (1904–14) consisted of 30,000 Jews and resulted in an equal, and maybe greater, return rate than that of the first,⁹ but the immigrants in this wave arrived with a larger sense of political purpose. The Jews of the second wave of immigration were steely in their resolve and fired with socialist zeal. The majority was secular and gave little thought to what some saw as the religiosity of their situation. As Mandel clarifies:

Back home they had denied or denounced both Jewish tradition and czarist government as well as God. They were no more subdued before Ottoman writ and Arab custom. They brought with them an air and swagger of rebelliousness. They were revolutionaries, come to create a new heaven and a new earth....¹⁰

With focused intent the immigrants of the Second Aliyah continued what the earlier immigrants had inaugurated, though somewhat feebly. They acquired as much land as possible so as to begin to “create for the Jewish people a home in Palestine.”¹¹ Through the “conquest of labor,” Zionists at the turn of the century applied a philosophy slightly divergent from many of the earlier immigrants, namely, an emphasis on establishing settlements that would operate exclusively on Jewish labor. In other words, the fellahin who had just been reduced to tenant farmers as a consequence of the Ottoman land laws and Zionist land purchases would now be unwelcome on the land altogether. Dr Arthur Ruppin, head of the Palestine Office of the Zionist Organization, which was in charge of colonization, put it thus:

Land is the most necessary thing for our establishing roots in Palestine. Since there are hardly any more arable unsettled lands in Palestine, we are bound in each case of the purchase of land and its settlement to remove the peasants who cultivated the land so far, both owners of the land and tenants.¹²

From 1878 to 1908, 400,000 dunams (1 dunam is 0.25 acres) were purchased out of a total 27 million dunams.¹³ The Zionists were off to a small but significant start, and with the increase of establishment came an increase in ideological determination. Needless to say, the native population who had been operating according to the same communal system for generations (centuries worth) grew dismayed and fearful of the changes that were taking hold.

THE SEEDS OF CONFLICT

So, you can see where this is headed. Jews from Russia, Eastern Europe, and to a degree Western Europe, treated none too kindly in their respective countries, have decided to remove themselves from a bad situation. The Zionist forefathers chose Palestine primarily for religious significance (though many of them were not practicing Jews), but neglected to note the presence of a fully developed indigenous population – one that had already cultivated most of the available arable land. Though perhaps somewhat behind the times, the Palestinians were making a go at catching up. In 1908 the revolt of the Young Turks within the Ottoman Empire brought, among other developments, freedom of the press. Two Palestinian newspapers came out during this time, Filastin in 1908 and al-Karmil in 1911. With a functioning press, a new voice in parliament as a result of Ottoman reforms, and a growing reaction to Zionist immigration and land purchases, a Palestinian nationalist movement was beginning to germinate. Irrespective of any particular level of cultural development, home was home, and had been for centuries. Vladimir Jabotinsky, an influential militant Zionist, had this to say later in 1923, though its pertinence is timeless:

[The Palestinians] look at Palestine with the same instinctive love and true fervor that any Aztec looked upon Mexico or any Sioux looked upon his prairie. Palestine will remain for the Palestinians not a borderland, but their birthplace, the center and basis of their own national existence.¹⁴

In terms of their growing sense of distinction, the die had been cast. However, this emerging nationalist mindset of the Palestinian Arabs was soon to be placed in a set of circumstances that would forever change them as a people and a culture. To the list of masters that have ruled over Palestine – Assyrians, Persians, Greeks, Romans, Arabs, Seljuk Turks, Crusaders, Mamluks, and Ottoman Turks – we will add another in the next chapter.

Note: The population of Palestine on the eve of World War I was 657,000 Muslims (including 55,000 nomads); 81,000 Christians; 60,000 Jews (including 21,000 non-Ottoman citizens), totaling 798,000.¹⁵

The Genesis of Conflict: Across Two World Wars

Note: In this chapter things get a little involved. Featured are going to be a good deal of names and dates: of people, international agreements, documents, committees, etc. Be that as it may, each section in this chapter will simply revolve around the two main concerns of a country involved in a war, that is, how the war is going and what can be gained when it's over.

Decisions made during the period covered in this chapter molded the Middle East into, more or less, what it is today. At the beginning of World War I, the countries of Lebanon, Israel, Syria, Jordan, Iraq, Kuwait, and the Arabian Peninsula states did not exist; the region consisted of Greater Syria, Palestine, and Arabia. The Middle East was casually carved up with a stick in the sand by foreign (European) powers, and with no concern for the people or cultures living in the newly created geopolitical designations. Colonel Edward Mandell House, an aide to President Woodrow Wilson, seeing France and Great Britain divide up their spoils at the end of World War I made a comment more prophetic than he probably realized: "They are making [the Middle East] a breeding place for future war."¹

WORLD WAR I (1914–18)

An examination of "the Great War," as it was originally called, is beyond the scope of our discussion, but for this section the period of the war's duration coincides with a period of great significance in the history we are concerned with – hence the main section names in this chapter. For a quick rundown: On August 1, 1914, Germany declared war on Russia, inaugurating an international upheaval that would set the Allies (Great Britain, France, Russia, Japan, and, in 1917, the United States) against the Central Powers (Germany, Austria-Hungary, and the Ottoman Empire). The Ottoman Empire, as we have seen, was not long for this world – being referred to as the "sick man of Europe" – and Great Britain and its ally France were quite aware of this. Perched and eager, London and Paris focused on those portions of the Ottoman Middle East they could each walk away with at the end of the conflict. Transforming these strategically desired portions, or "spheres of influence," into colonial assets was the driving force of the decisions made, especially by Britain, during the war.

Though allied with Germany, the Ottoman Empire at first played it neutral. But despite Allied attempts to persuade the Ottomans to remain so, the Turks entered the war on Germany's side in November 1914. Once the Ottoman Empire sided with the Central Powers, the Bosphorus Strait was then closed, choking off Russia's import/export lifeline. Within a year, Russia's supplies were fearfully low and the threat of its pulling out of the war loomed over France and Britain; Russia's withdrawal would allow Germany to concentrate on the western front.

At the same time, Britain grew concerned about its capacity to protect its colonial interests, particularly, keeping the Suez Canal (between the Sinai Peninsula and mainland Egypt), as well as its access to oil in present-day Iraq and southwestern present-day Iran. One step toward dealing with these concerns, and appeasing the Russians, was the Constantinople Agreement (March 1915), which satisfied Russian desire for postwar control of Constantinople, the Dardanelles, the Bosphorus Strait, and the surrounding territory – essentially the northwest chunk of present-day Turkey. In return, France and Britain would gain the whole of the Middle East that was under Ottoman control. So that was settled.

It is important to keep in mind that the Allied countries were not, by virtue of their allied relationship, pals. Britain, France, and Russia did not trust one another for anything, and in some instances they saw the other as a potential enemy down the road. Now that it had been agreed that the Middle East was to be the sphere of influence for Britain and France, Britain worked overtime to keep France somewhat content while not having to concede any territory thought to be strategically valuable to the British Empire. London realized that in order to protect its interests, the Arabs, who were more than ready to part company with their Ottoman masters, might come in handy in destabilizing the Ottoman Empire for them.

What follows is a string of promises and agreements between Britain and the Arabs, and between London and Paris, which when we get done will make absolutely no sense – and that is exactly what was intended.

1. The Hussein–McMahon Correspondence (1915–16)

The British high commissioner in Cairo, Sir Henry McMahon, and Sharif Hussein of Mecca sustained an exchange of letters from mid-1915 to January 1916. In these letters was discussed the particulars regarding an agreement between the Arabs and Great Britain. Britain wanted the Arabs to revolt against the Ottoman Turks, and Hussein wanted guarantees from McMahon that the British would pick up the tab as well as help the Arabs attain independence. The question of boundaries was also addressed – one that historian Arthur Goldschmidt describes as, “one of the toughest issues in modern Middle Eastern history.”² McMahon, while willing to “recognize and support the independence of the Arabs in all the regions within the limits demanded by the Sherif of Mecca,” included some exceptions.³ To keep France from getting nervous the British included them in territorial considerations, all the while maintaining certain areas deemed vital to British interests. McMahon stated the following:

The two districts of Mersina and Alexandretta [northwest Syria] and portions of Syria lying to the west of the districts of Damascus, Homs, Hama and Aleppo cannot be said to be purely Arab, and should be excluded from the limits demanded.⁴

The cities of Damascus, Homs, Hama, and Aleppo run south to north in a rather straight line through western Syria. This would suggest that the land referred to in McMahon’s letter would pertain to present-day Lebanon and the Syrian coast. Arab interpretation was in line with this thinking, but the British later maintained that the use of the word “districts” suggested that the land west of the district of Damascus (the capital of Greater Syria) included present-day Jordan, and therefore would exclude from independence the land west of the Jordan River, namely, Palestine. In the Hussein–McMahon correspondence Palestine is never mentioned by name.

2. The Sykes–Picot Agreement (1916)

Meanwhile, in November 1915, Great Britain approached France to settle postwar divisions of the Middle East. Representing France was Francois Georges-Picot, a French diplomat, and representing Great Britain was Sir Mark Sykes, a member of Parliament. Between France's serious interest in Syria and Britain's increasing presence and involvement in the Middle East, negotiation was necessary to allay concerns between the two powers. Similar to the Constantinople Agreement in March, the powers were carving up something that was not dead yet. In a secret treaty that was ratified in May 1916 (the Sykes–Picot Agreement would not be published until after the war) Paris and London divided between themselves the whole of the Middle East, designating areas as zones of direct control and spheres of indirect influence. The indirect spheres, where Britain and France would be guaranteed priority in enterprise and local loans (most of modern Lebanon, Syria, Iraq, and Jordan), were to be the sites of the independent state(s) promised to Sharif Hussein. Palestine, except for the far south and the ports of Haifa and Jaffa, which went to Britain, was to remain an international entity, the administration of which was to be determined later. Needless to say, the Sykes–Picot Agreement and the Hussein–McMahon correspondence had little in common and made for future disagreement, as we shall see.

3. The Balfour Declaration (1917)

Foreign Office
November 2nd, 1917.

Dear Lord Rothschild,

I have much pleasure in conveying to you, on behalf of His Majesty's Government, the following declaration of sympathy with Jewish Zionist aspirations which has been submitted to, and approved by, the Cabinet.

“His Majesty's Government view with favour the establishment in Palestine of a national home for the Jewish people, and will use their best endeavours to facilitate the achievement of this object, it being clearly understood that nothing shall be done which may prejudice the civil and religious rights of existing non-Jewish communities in Palestine, or the rights and political status enjoyed by Jews in any other country.”

I should be grateful if you would bring this declaration to the knowledge of the Zionist Federation.

Yours sincerely,

ARTHUR JAMES BALFOUR⁵

Read it again for good measure. The Balfour Declaration is without a doubt the most controversial document to come out of the entire history of the Palestine–Israel conflict. Interpretations of its meaning, and views of its legitimacy, vary widely and greatly, to say the least. In the form of a letter from the foreign secretary, Arthur Balfour, to Lord Walter Rothschild, a leader of the British Jewish community, the British in one fell swoop made an impact on the region that still resonates today.

With the war growing in intensity, both Britain and France were anxious about Russia staying in the war and hopeful that the United States would enter it on the side of the Allies. The resulting rationale was this: If Britain extended a declaration of support for Zionism, influential Russian and American Jews would then help the Allies achieve these goals of Russian persistence and American entrance. Until now, Palestine was not deemed vital to British strategic designs. But with a new government (December 1916) and new prime minister (Lloyd George), Great Britain began to re-evaluate its objectives. Palestine would serve as a buffer between British and French territories, thus protecting Britain's control of the Suez Canal and Egypt. Yet, two things stood in the way that the Balfour Declaration's support of Jewish self-determination fixed, at least on paper: (1) The Russian Revolution of 1917 ushered in Bolshevik rule, which was against imperial hegemony (domination); and (2) US President Wilson's denunciation, also, of imperial hegemony and his support of national self-determination, later formalized in the declaration of his Fourteen Points. In other words, by helping the Zionists establish a national home in Palestine, the British could claim to be aiding self-determination while imperially setting up shop in Palestine. As Lord Balfour stated to the war cabinet in October 1917, where the declaration was approved:

The vast majority of Jews in Russia and America, as indeed all over the world, now appeared to be favorable to Zionism. If we could make a declaration favorable to such an ideal, we should be able to carry on extremely useful propaganda both in Russia and in America.⁶

The Balfour Declaration was the product of much debate and lobbying on the part of Zionists, anti-Zionists Jewish groups, and the British government. In an effort to satisfy the Zionists, anti-Zionists, the Americans, the Arabs (who were still fighting the Ottoman Turks), and the Hussein–McMahon promises, the final version of the Balfour Declaration used deliberately imprecise language, for example, the establishment of a national home for the Jews in Palestine. For Zionists, this was interpreted as a Jewish national state, while for anti-Zionists, Sharif Hussein, and Woodrow Wilson – all of whom accepted the declaration – this meant a Jewish protectorate or sanctuary located in Palestine. Chaim Weizmann, an extremely influential Zionist close to the British government (and eventual first president of the state of Israel), indicated: “[The wording] would mean exactly what we would make it mean – neither more nor less.”⁷ Edwin Montagu, British secretary of state for India and member of the Jewish anti-Zionist camp in the discussions, maintained:

I assume that it means that Mohammedans [Muslims] and Christians are to make way for the Jews ... you will find a population in Palestine driving out its present inhabitants, taking all the best country.... Palestine will become the world's Ghetto.⁸

Montagu also argued that Jews and Judaism were a culture and not a nation, and to create one would inflame European anti-Semitism by suggesting that Jews were something distinct and apart.

Promises, Promises

In June of 1916, the Arabs began their revolt against the Ottoman Turks. With British provision of arms and advisers, the best known of whom was T. E. Lawrence (“Lawrence of Arabia”),⁹ and the leadership of Hussein's son Faisal, the Ottomans were defeated and the Armistice of Mudros was signed on October 30, 1918. This ended the Middle Eastern portion of the war. In light of the Sykes–Picot Agreement and the Balfour Declaration, promises to Sharif Hussein looked less than genuine, yet this did not stop Britain from making more promises to the Arabs – which in turn were contradictory to Sykes–Picot and the Balfour Declaration.

Aside from these assurances of self-determination and independence made to the Arabs, some earlier on-the-side guarantees are noteworthy: (1) The Baghdad Proclamation of March 1917 promised independence to Arabs of present-day Iraq when British forces took Baghdad; (2) the “Declaration of the Seven” in June 1918 promised independence to Arab lands that were independent before the war, or had been liberated by Arab forces; and (3) in December 1917, between the first two promises, General Edmund Allenby, after occupying Palestine and while heading toward Syria, made the following declaration:

The object of war in the East on the part of Great Britain was the complete and final liberation of all peoples formerly oppressed by the Turks and the establishment of national governments and administrations in those countries deriving authority from the initiative and free will of those people themselves....¹⁰

If we add all this up – Hussein–McMahon, Sykes–Picot, Balfour, and the odd promise of independence here and there – we are left with a pile of documents and declarations, none of which seems to have greater legal or official legitimacy over any other. Moreover, the issue of interpretation, of at least Hussein–McMahon, Sykes–Picot, and Balfour, seems to suffer from the same confusion.

At eleven o'clock, on the eleventh day of the eleventh month of 1918, World War I ended. Germany and the Allies signed the armistice at Compiègne, in France. But things in the Middle East were just getting warmed up.

INTERWAR PERIOD (1919–39)

The Paris Peace Conference (1919) put an official end to the war, and gave rise to a number of treaties between the Allied powers and their enemies. The Treaty of Versailles, which concentrated on Germany's responsibilities, also provided for the birth of the League of Nations (the predecessor to the United Nations). The League's chief advocate and architect was President Wilson, who had included plans of such an international body in his Fourteen Points. This program was a peace plan he created near the end of the war to undertake matters of postwar intentions on the part of the Allies. Regarding Ottoman territory, Point 12 called for the "absolutely unmolested opportunity of autonomous development" of those territories.¹¹

The League of Nations was an international apparatus designed to prevent, through diplomacy and conflict negotiation, the kind of upheaval and violence that embodied World War I. In its defining document, known as the Covenant, the League created the mandate system. A system of guardianship, the mandate assigned a "mandatory" power to those territories and nationalities judged soon-to-be capable of sovereignty, but were in need of tutelage and further development. Article 22 of the Covenant begins with the following paragraph:

To those colonies and territories which as a consequence of the late war have ceased to be under the sovereignty of the States which formerly governed them and which are inhabited by peoples not yet able to stand by themselves under the strenuous conditions of the modern world, there should be applied the principle that the well-being and development of such peoples form a sacred trust of civilisation and that securities for the performance of this trust should be embodied in this Covenant.

Article 22 then goes on to say:

Certain communities formerly belonging to the Turkish Empire have reached a stage of development where their existence as independent nations can be provisionally recognized subject to the rendering of administrative advice and assistance by a Mandatory until such time as they are able to stand alone. *The wishes of these communities must be a principal consideration in the selection of the Mandatory.*¹² [Emphasis added.]

Now it must be borne in mind that France and Great Britain were not thrilled about Wilson's policies of self-determination and "unmolested opportunity of autonomous development." Molestation was the very intention of these two nations, but Wilson's power and prestige as a statesman made it difficult for Paris and London to fly in the face of said policies. As the last sentence of the above-quoted passage of Article 22 states quite clearly, the people of Greater Syria (which includes Jordan), Palestine, and what is modern-day Iraq, were to have a say in who their mandatory power was to be. Needless to say, Britain and France were not keen on this either.

The King–Crane Commission (1919)

To determine the “wishes of these communities” an American delegation called the King–Crane Commission was sent to the Middle East. Headed by Henry King, president of Oberlin College, and Charles Crane, a Chicago businessman, the commission toured Syria and Palestine (but not Iraq) through June and July of 1919, making its report in August. Though beginning the tour in favor of Zionism, extracts from the report indicate a change of view:

- If ... the strict terms of the Balfour Statement are adhered to ... it can hardly be doubted that the extreme Zionist Program must be greatly modified. For a “national home for the Jewish people” is not equivalent to making Palestine into a Jewish State; nor can the erection of such a Jewish State be accomplished without the gravest trespass upon the “civil and religious rights of existing non-Jewish communities in Palestine.”
- If that principle [Wilson’s principle of self-determination] is to rule, and so the wishes of Palestine’s population are to be decisive as to what is to be done with Palestine, then it is to be remembered that the non-Jewish population of Palestine – nearly nine-tenths of the whole – are emphatically against the entire Zionist program.
- No British officer, consulted by the Commissioners, believed that the Zionist program could be carried out except by force of arms ... That of itself is evidence of a strong sense of the injustice of the Zionist program.
- For the initial claim, often submitted by Zionist representatives, that they have a “right” to Palestine, based on an occupation of two thousand years ago, can hardly be seriously considered.¹³

The commission would go on to suggest limited Jewish immigration, the creation of one state of Greater Syria (including Palestine), and the United States as the mandatory power, with Great Britain as a secondary option. The King–Crane report, however, would not be published for several years after its submission to the Paris Peace Conference. With its threat to French and British imperial interests, and with Wilson’s absence in trying to gain Senate support of the Treaty of Versailles (which he never did, thus the United States was never part of the League of Nations), the report died on the vine. Balfour’s comments at the end of the King–Crane investigation are revealing:

For in Palestine we do not propose even to go through the form of consulting the wishes of the present inhabitants of the country ... Zionism, be it right or wrong, good or bad, is rooted in age-long traditions, in present needs, in future hopes, of far profounder import than the desires and prejudices of the 700,000 Arabs who now inhabit that ancient land.¹⁴

It was at the San Remo Conference (April 1920; League of Nations ratification took place in July 1922) that the mandates were distributed. Great Britain was given mandatory responsibility over Palestine (with inclusion of the Balfour Declaration in the mandate), Transjordan (later Jordan), and Iraq. The French were assigned Syria and Lebanon.¹⁵

Note: This marks the beginning of the modern Middle East, as it exists on maps today. The countries of Lebanon, Syria, Jordan, Palestine (which mostly becomes Israel), and Iraq, are all relatively young, each having existed as part of an Ottoman whole less than 100 years ago.

The 1922 White Paper

Right before ratification of the mandate, Britain was already busying itself with imperial concerns, which necessarily meant a departure from the mandate. Winston Churchill, then colonial secretary, issued the White Paper of June 1922, which denied that Palestine was to become, like Zionist leader Chaim Weizmann had indicated, as Jewish as England is English.¹⁶ The paper also maintained that the Jewish national home mentioned in the Balfour Declaration was to be founded in Palestine. Churchill, in an attempt to calm Arab apprehensions in Palestine, was toning down the spirit of the Balfour Declaration while not throwing it out the window altogether. He hoped to smooth things over and reduce conflict in Palestine, thus making it more manageable from a colonial vantage point. The Zionists hesitantly agreed to the white paper, with the Arabs rejecting it owing to its continued acknowledgment and support of the Balfour Declaration.

Palestine at the end of World War I was something of a mess. It was used as a staging area early in the war, and shortly thereafter it became a battleground. To make matters worse, the crop yield had been poor on account of weather and locusts, so the economy was in sad shape, and the people were hungry and malnourished. To that we add an increasingly agitated and hostile Arab population (almost 90 percent of Palestine) who viewed Zionism, Jewish immigration, and the Balfour Declaration as attempts to create a Jewish state at their expense, ultimately to result in their dispossession.

All the while, Great Britain was looking to sustain its colonial control of Palestine, and thus needed to justify indefinite presence there in light of Wilson's policies. Conflict was necessary (to make the justification), but not too much of it (to keep the effort and price down). To do this required a juggling act, keeping both groups, Arabs and Jews, somewhat appeased.

At the time, much of Britain's leadership was one or more of the following: (a) sympathetic to the Zionist cause, (b) under the anti-Semitic assumption that being in league with the Jews would benefit Britain financially, or (c) of the view that the Zionist presence in Palestine gave Britain the perfect justification for being there in the first place. Generally, however, the military personnel and officials in Palestine tended, more often than not, to find sympathy with the Arabs. They felt that Zionist goals would ultimately jeopardize Britain's colonial standing, and encountered the oftentimes abrupt and adverse air of the determined European and Russian Jews who were trying to create a safe haven state there. But try as Britain did to strike a balance, the incompatible interests of the Arabs (independence), the Zionists (a Jewish state), and Great Britain (colonial control) created an untenable situation that eventually – and unsurprisingly – turned violent.

The Western Wall (see Chapter 1), located in Jerusalem, is a remaining segment of the outer wall of the second Jewish temple; Herod rebuilt Solomon's temple during the time of Christ. Today's wall is part of Herod's reconstruction, and is now the holiest site of Judaism. The wall is part of the perimeter that contains the Temple Mount, as it is known to Jews and Christians, or Haram al-Sharif (Arabic for "Holy Sanctuary"), as it is known to Muslims. For all three religions, this is the site where Abraham attempted to slay his son, Isaac (Genesis 22:1–18; Quran 37:102–10). For the Muslims, also, the Western Wall is where Muhammad tethered his horse, al-Buraq, before making his nocturnal journey to Heaven. Preceded by Mecca and Medina, the Haram al-Sharif is the third holiest site of the Islamic faith, and houses the Dome of the Rock and the Al-Aqsa Mosque. Naturally, the British and the League of Nations were aware of all this and accordingly included in the mandate a policy to preserve the status quo in this realm. Regardless, tensions were building among Arabs and Jews, and were to play out where these two peoples ostensibly differed, and at a place where emotions are prone to run higher than elsewhere.

In summer 1928, Jews customarily praying at the wall brought benches and a screen for separating worshippers according to gender. Arousing Arab indignation, Palestinians approached the British authorities to remove the screen. This sparked a series of provocations from Arab and Zionist leaders, which further upset their own people and agitated the other. A year went by, and the following summer the aggravation reached a crisis, producing riots in Jerusalem that then spread to other towns. The violence lasted roughly a week, resulting in the deaths of 133 Jews and 116 Arabs, with most of the latter killed by British reinforcements. Some of the bloodiest attacks were perpetrated by the Arab rioters, who often killed unarmed Orthodox Jews of the Old Yishuv. A number of Jews in Hebron, however, were aided during the attacks and hidden by their Arab neighbors. In response, the British sent a commission to investigate the underlying causes of the riots, producing further commissions and white papers:

1. The Shaw Report (September 1929)

This commission was headed by Sir Walter Shaw, and found the reasons for the conflict and unrest to be the aggravated landless class of Arabs, who were fearful of Zionism and dispossession. The commission suggested controlled Jewish immigration, a precisely laid-out Arab policy, and the cessation of evicting Arabs from land transfers. The Zionists were dismayed with Shaw's conclusions and demanded the formation of a new commission. Jewish immigration was temporarily suspended, and British prime minister Ramsay MacDonald called for a new investigation.

2. The Hope-Simpson Commission (1930)

Headed by Sir John Hope-Simpson, this inquiry attributed the violence to Zionist labor policies; the policy of making Jewish-bought land inalienable created Arab unemployment. The conclusions and recommendations were more or less identical to the Shaw Report and were incorporated into the following white paper.

3. The Passfield White Paper (1930)

This white paper recommended limits on Jewish immigration, and concessions regarding the settling of landless Arabs. The Zionists were furious. Weizmann, along with other senior Zionist leaders and prominent members of the British and American Jewish communities, threatened and put immense pressure on the MacDonald government. In a letter to the House of Commons, the prime minister repudiated the white paper.

What occurred next was the Arab Revolt. A list of what inspired the uprising, which spanned 1936 to 1939, would include the following: (1) dismissal of the 1929/Western Wall inquiries; (2) a generation of young people (Jewish and Arab) who grew up in the mandate and were more literate and politically minded; (3) a worldwide depression; (4) rising Arab unemployment; and (5) increased Jewish immigration as a result of Adolf Hitler's rise to power in 1933. The first phase (April–November 1936) was the shorter and less violent of the two, and featured a general strike, a boycott on Jewish goods, and violence committed against Jews and British alike. The British in turn promised a new commission of inquiry – though commissions were beginning to lose their appeal. In conjunction with a lack of Arab success and the significant British suppression of the revolt, Arab leadership called off the strike and the violence subsided. This ended the first phase. The promised commission would result (again) in the following inquiries and subsequent white paper:

1. The Peel Commission (1937)

The list of reasons for the Arab anger and violence expressed in the revolt that was provided by the Peel Commission report bears much resemblance to the previous reports we have covered in this chapter. As the report itself enumerates:

The underlying causes of the disturbances of 1936 were –

1) The desire of the Arabs for national independence; 2) their hatred and fear of the establishment of the Jewish National Home.

These two causes were the same as those of all the previous outbreaks and have always been inextricably linked together. Of several subsidiary factors, the more important were –

1) the advance of Arab nationalism outside Palestine; 2) the increased immigration of Jews since 1933; 3) the opportunity enjoyed by the Jews for influencing public opinion in Britain; 4) Arab distrust in the sincerity of the British Government; 5) Arab alarm at the continued Jewish purchase of land; 6) the general uncertainty as to the ultimate intentions of the Mandatory Power.¹⁷

The commission deemed the mandate unviable and ultimately suggested that the solution to the conflict was partition of Palestine into separate Arab and Jewish states. The Jews were allocated 20 percent of the country, the area comprised of the north and the upper coast. The Arabs were given the rest of mandatory Palestine, with it becoming part of Transjordan.

The Zionist leadership was not altogether pleased with this report, but it was a start and they accepted it. The Arabs were outraged. From September 1937 to January 1939 they made that very clear by carrying out the second phase of the Arab Revolt. For a year and a half Palestine became lawless. Arab violence found not only Jewish and British victims, but Arab victims as well; notable Arab families were accused of conspiracy and corruption and were subjected to attacks. With the breakdown of leadership, the Arab Revolt became fragmented, chaotic, and ultimately ended in failure. Given the turbulence in Palestine and its threat to Britain's position there, London needed to diffuse Arab unrest. In the shadow of an approaching second world war against fascism and the Nazis – who were beginning to issue propaganda in the Middle East in an attempt to court Arab favor and undermine the British – the British needed to reassess their policy toward the Arabs. Hence, we continue with the list.

2. The Woodhead Commission (1938)

In an attempt to appease the Arab population, both inside and outside Palestine, the Woodhead Commission was set up to re-evaluate the Peel Report's suggestion to partition Palestine. The report asserted that "the political, administrative, and financial difficulties involved in the proposal to create independent Arab and Jewish States inside Palestine are so great that this solution of the problem is impracticable."¹⁸ Nevertheless, three partition plans were included in this report, all of them allocating significantly less land to the Zionists. Zionist response was predictably negative, and the British then issued another white paper, which made quite an impact.

3. The 1939 White Paper

After a failed attempt at resolving the conflict in a roundtable meeting in London, known as the St James Conference, the British announced their new policy on May 17, 1939, declaring that “His Majesty’s Government believe that the framers of the Mandate in which the Balfour Declaration was embodied could not have intended that Palestine should be converted into a Jewish State against the will of the Arab population of the country.”¹⁹ The document then goes on to cite Churchill’s White Paper of 1922 as proof! (So many documents, papers, and promises had been generated at this point that the British, and anyone else for that matter, could hand-pick them to suit a variety of agendas.) The white paper envisaged a Jewish national home in Palestine, with controlled Jewish immigration for five years, and the implementation of Arab–Jewish self-governing institutions. The 1939 White Paper was rejected by both sides: the Zionists maintained it contravened the mandate, and the Arabs wanted immediate independence, period. But by this time World War II was about to commence and Great Britain, along with the rest of the world, was focusing its energies on the approaching global turmoil.

WORLD WAR II (1939–45)

Note: For our discussion, brevity is necessary in describing the events of this war. It may seem odd to mention only briefly the plight of Europe’s Jews in the Holocaust, but this event has more to do with European history and less with Middle Eastern affairs. The effects were certainly felt in Palestine – increased Jewish immigration, changes in British policy – but a substantive treatment would be reaching beyond our purview. A short summary will suffice:²⁰ Sworn in as chancellor in 1933, Adolf Hitler immediately began the installation of the Nazi Party, or the Third Reich, in Germany. He soon began developing policies to purify Germany, and the “bloodlines” of its people. Jews were viewed as a social and political threat to German society, and thus were defined as a race that had to be purged. What started with denial of basic civil rights and deprivation of citizenship escalated into the “final solution of the Jewish question.” Over the course of World War II, the Nazis executed six million Jews, along with homosexuals, the mentally retarded and insane, and gypsies, also collectively numbering in the millions.

On September 1, 1939, the Second World War began with Germany’s invasion of Poland. The next five years featured destruction and bloodshed the likes of which the world has never seen in its entire history. When the Allies (mainly Great Britain, France, the USSR, and later, the United States) and the Axis powers (mainly Germany, Japan, and Italy) finished battling one another, the death toll reached between 40 and 50 million people. If you killed every man, woman, and child in New York City, Chicago, and Los Angeles, you would only kill half as many people.

Great Britain’s primary concern, needless to say, was its involvement in the war, and the 1939 White Paper made it very clear that what London valued most in Palestine was stability, which meant appeasing the Arab population. This of course came at the expense of giving the Zionists short shrift, leaving them none too pleased by the arrangement. Zionist–British relations plummeted during World War II and would never recover.

Zionism as an ideology became more militant, a methodology endorsed by David Ben-Gurion, head of the Jewish Agency and eventually Israel’s first prime minister. In contrast was Chaim Weizmann, then head of the World Zionist Organization, who preferred gradualism and diplomacy. Weizmann’s diplomatic approach, however, was pushed aside by Zionist leaders like

Ben-Gurion and, earlier, Vladimir Jabotinsky. This militancy gave way to the use of violence to achieve political goals, with Zionist terrorism soon targeting British buildings and personnel. The most notorious terrorist groups were the Irgun and LEHI.²¹

Along with increasing militancy was growing Jewish-American interest in Zionism and Palestine. Especially in light of the Holocaust's atrocities, news of which emerged in 1942, American Jews began to support Zionism. The Biltmore Conference in New York City (May 1942) was one of the catalyzing events that brought Jewish-American support to Zionist organizations. The conference maintained that Palestine should be opened for unlimited immigration under Jewish monitor, and that it also be established as a Jewish Commonwealth. Between the alliance of American and European Zionists and news of the Holocaust, support and publicity began to grow for the Zionist movement.

At the end of World War II Britain was broke and beleaguered. Back in Palestine, Zionists were digging in and growing bolder, as well as becoming more organized and determined. Things for the Arab population remained fairly constant and quiet throughout the war. They even enjoyed a slight economic boost, though remaining virtually leaderless after the revolt and riots of the late 1930s. Filling this vacuum was the leadership of the surrounding Arab states, who met in Alexandria, Egypt (October 1944), and created a pact called the Alexandria Protocol. (This meeting would lead to the formation of the Arab League, an organization that still exists today.) In the Alexandria Protocol Palestine was the subject of a resolution stating the following:

Palestine constitutes an important part of the Arab world and that the rights of the [Palestinian] Arabs cannot be touched without prejudice to peace and stability in the Arab world....

The Committee also declares that it is second to none in regretting the woes that have been inflicted upon the Jews of Europe by European dictatorial states. But the question of these Jews should not be confused with Zionism, for there can be no greater injustice and aggression than solving the problem of the Jews of Europe by another injustice, that is, by inflicting injustice on the Palestine Arabs of various religions and denominations.²²

The Arab League helped guide Palestine toward something of a unified leadership, but the protocol fell on deaf ears the world over. The events of World War II had brought the plight of the Jews to international light, and permanently attached Palestine to this unspeakable chapter in history.

III

Conflict

As is common, the preparatory work takes longer, which is what we have been doing for the first two parts of the book. But as the end of Chapter 6 portends, the elements in Palestine – native Arabs, Zionist Jews, and British colonialism – formed an admixture that was not likely to find its own equilibrium, at least not in any gentle kind of way. Chapter 7, as its title indicates, covers 1947 to 1967, which forms the nucleus of the Palestine–Israel conflict; it is perhaps the most important chapter in the book. Chapter 8 is full of wars, but also sees the reemergence of the Palestinians, who get scooted aside a little in Chapter 7. The ninth and tenth chapters bring us up to date, examining the developments of the last 30 years.

Partition, Israeli Statehood, and the Six-Day War: 1947–1967

Note: What was developing in the last chapter will now become actual and official in this chapter. The conflict in which “those people have been fighting for thousands of years” really goes back about as far as the film Miracle on 34th Street, and the first airing of the children’s television show Kukla, Fran and Ollie; if you were born before 1948, you’re older than Israel.

In the 20 years covered in this chapter, Israel as a nation-state emerges; Palestine is reduced to 20 percent of its post-World War I size; and the Arab–Israeli conflict between Israel and the surrounding Arab nations is born. And by chapter’s end, in 1967, we will arrive, for all intents and purposes, at present history in which the region is still embroiled.

POSTWAR AND THE TWILIGHT OF THE BRITISH EMPIRE

The end of World War II brought with it a redistribution of global political power. Where Western Europe had been the locus of global power, the United States and the Soviet Union were now the two “superpowers,” both with little in the way of competition from anyone else. Great Britain, much to the contrary, found itself out of money and unable to sustain its imperial presence across western Asia. With Britain’s announcement (February 1947) that it was pulling out of various colonial holdings, including Palestine, Washington was handed the baton and became London’s replacement in the Middle East. By this time, Russia had grabbed up all of Eastern and Central Europe, and began looking toward the Middle East, Turkey and Iran in particular. Causing concern in the Harry S. Truman administration (Roosevelt died April 1945), on March 12, 1947, the White House announced the Truman Doctrine.

The intent of this policy was to contain Russian expansion – and the feared specter of communism – by economically supporting countries (mainly Greece and Turkey) that were deemed potential prey for the Soviets. The resultant balance of power and rivalry between Washington and Moscow led to what became known as the Cold War. Also in response to the developing Cold War psychology was the creation of the Marshall Plan. The United States feared that the beleaguered and unstable economies of Western Europe would tempt voters in these countries toward communism. By instituting this economic and military reconstruction plan the United States could further cultivate democracy – and alliances – thus inoculating the rest of Europe from potential Soviet influence.¹ As far as views on communism were concerned, the United States and Great Britain were in agreement, yet their views and interests with regard to the Palestine question were divergent. This brings us to the epilogue of British colonialism and the prelude of direct and long-term American involvement in the Middle East.

As historian Charles D. Smith observes: “Immigration became the nexus of British–American–Zionist interactions.”² Great Britain, in trying to cling to what colonial control it could, began reassessing its strategy. With the 1939 White Paper still intact (p. 80), the British were also concerned about their oil holdings in the Persian Gulf, a commodity vital to their economy. Given these preoccupations, Britain was more inclined to make gestures toward the Arabs so as not to rock the boat; vast immigration into Palestine would unnerve the Palestinians and subvert London’s needs. The Truman White House was torn on the matter and decided to shoot down the middle. The president felt personally obligated to do something for the displaced Jews – a gesture that would also help things domestically (“I’m sorry, gentlemen, but I have to answer to hundreds of thousands who are anxious for the success of Zionism; I do not have hundreds of thousands of Arabs among my constituents.”³). The US State Department, on the other hand, had its eye on Soviet expansion and decided that currying Arab favor was in America’s best interest. Truman, more verbally supportive of the Jews than he actually was, asked the British to allow 100,000 Jewish refugees into Palestine. This obviously did not serve British interests, naturally resulting in delay on London’s end. The British devised a committee that would attempt to solve the immigration/refugee impasse: the Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry (AAC).

Six British and six American delegates formed the twelve-man committee, which would interview Jewish refugees in America and Europe. What they decided (May 1946) was the following: the issuing of 100,000 immigration certificates; rejection of partition of Palestine; relaxed immigration; non-restriction of Jewish land purchases; and the outlawing of discriminatory Zionist labor laws. Great Britain would continue the role of administrator, thus continuing its mandate.

The following groups were unsatisfied with the AAC report: the British, the Americans, the Zionists, and the Arabs. (The Americans and the Zionists were supportive of the immigration certificates, the British and the Arabs were not – all for different reasons, of course.) In a final effort the British, as could be expected, created another committee: the Morrison–Grady Committee. The report of Morrison–Grady suggested, again, the 100,000 certificates along with partition of Palestine into semi-autonomous cantons (districts or zones), and the eventual creation of a binational state with the British overseeing administrative concerns – a continuance of the mandate. London found this solution palatable but met resistance from the other three parties. By this time, however, the sun had set on the British Empire.

1947: PARTITION

In February 1947, Britain handed Palestine to the United Nations. The reasons for this decision are somewhat speculative, but within a narrow range of possibilities. London’s lack of economic willpower to carry on is certainly one reason. That Britain may have been hoping the UN would simply decide to prolong the mandate and maybe support some of London’s recent proposals is another.⁴ As historian Benny Morris summarizes, British relations with the United States were certainly a consideration:

Most historians agree that given the Cold War context, in which the need for Anglo-American amity was seen as paramount, and Britain’s insolvency, Whitehall [London] could ill afford to alienate Washington over a highly emotional issue that, when all was said and done, was not a vital British interest.⁵

The UN set up the United Nations Special Committee on Palestine (UNSCOP), an eleven-member team composed of representatives from eleven different UN member countries.⁶ Spending five weeks in Palestine, the team set out to determine a solution to the Palestine question once and for all.

The committee submitted its report in August, which consisted of a majority report of seven nations (Australia abstained), and a minority report submitted by Iran, India, and Yugoslavia. The majority report suggested partition of Palestine into two states, Jewish and Arab, with Jerusalem existing as an international entity. All this was on the condition that each state signed a treaty establishing “the economic union of Palestine.”⁷ The minority report instead proposed an “independent federal state” made up of an Arab state and a Jewish state. These states would be autonomous while existing in a federation creating “a single Palestinian nationality and citizenship.”⁸ The Arabs rejected the UNSCOP reports altogether. Historian Mark Tessler elucidates the Arab response:

They adhered to their long-held position that Palestine was an integral part of the Arab world and that from the beginning its indigenous inhabitants has opposed the creation in their country of a Jewish national home. They also insisted that the United Nations, a body created and controlled by the United States and Europe, had no right to grant the Zionists any portion of their territory. In what was to become a familiar Arab charge, they insisted that the Western world was seeking to salve its conscience for the atrocities of the war and was paying its own debt to the Jewish people with someone else’s land.⁹

The Zionists cautiously approved the majority report and began a campaign to garner Truman’s support for it. As one scholar put it: “The Palestine issue in the fall of 1947 was an Arab–Zionist contest within an Anglo-American controversy about to be drawn into the Soviet–American cold war.”¹⁰ Yet, in late September, Great Britain unilaterally (acting by itself) decided to end its mandate and withdraw from Palestine. The UN General Assembly would now determine definitively the matter of partition and Palestine.

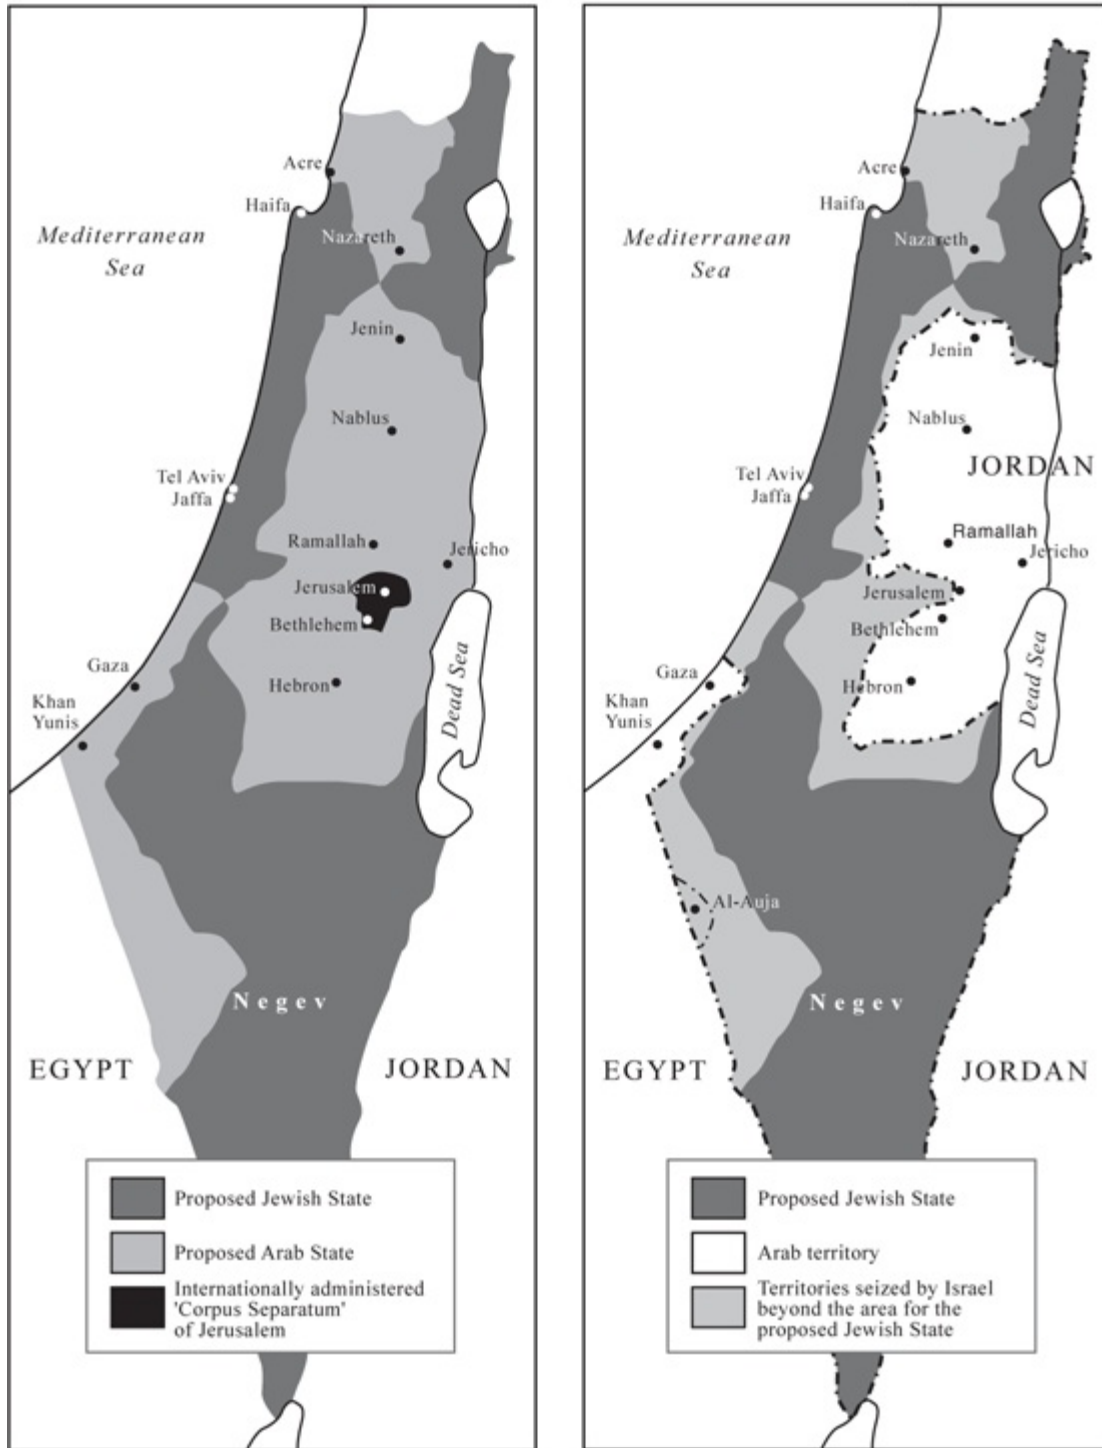

In the time leading up to the General Assembly vote, lobbying on the issue was thick and fast. Truman, though supportive of Zionism, was not a guaranteed vote for partition. However, with Zionist pressure from both Palestine and within the US government, along with Soviet support for partition, Truman adopted a pro-partition stance. Truman noted the intensity during this period of lobbying: “I do not think I ever had as much pressure and propaganda aimed at the White House as I had in this instance.”¹¹ Moreover, on the eve of the vote, the necessary two-thirds majority was not in place (by a small margin), which resulted in the not-so-gentle American–Zionist persuasion of those countries planning to vote it down; threats of aid termination and embargoes were generally the method of persuasion.¹²

The vote for partition as proposed in the UNSCOP majority report was held on November 29, 1947, with 33 nations in favor, 13 against, and 10 abstentions, thereby passing UN Resolution 181.¹³ Both the United States and the Soviet Union voted in favor, with Great Britain abstaining. The boundaries of the partition were modeled on the delineations in the UNSCOP report, but with slight modifications. The land allocated to the Zionists comprised 56 percent of Palestine. And then war broke out.

CIVIL WAR, ISRAELI STATEHOOD

The Arabs were outraged at the UN’s vote. They could not abide what essentially amounted to Europe and the United States giving 56 percent of Palestine to a foreign population making up just over 30 percent of the whole. (The population figures for 1946 are 1.3 million Arabs and 600,000 Jews, with 30,000 other.¹⁴) What followed was a year of war. The first phase (from the UN vote to May 14, 1948) was a civil war between Jews and Palestinian Arabs, all within Palestine. The second phase was an international war (from May 15, 1948, to the end of the year) between the new state of Israel and the surrounding Arab nations: Syria, Jordan, Egypt, Iraq, and to a lesser degree, Lebanon. By the end of the international war the map of what we have been calling Palestine assumed its present-day form.

Maps adapted from PASSIA, 2002

Map 2 UNGA Partition Plan, 1947 (UN 181), and Armistice Lines, 1949

Having undertaken a solution in Palestine, the UN ended up making things worse. With questionable legal authority for the UN to impose partition, and no intervention of peacekeeping forces to implement such a plan, Palestine resorted to self-reliance in the form of violence. The UN and the international community kept their distance, both hesitant to enforce partition directly on a majority Arab population; taking into consideration the UN's purpose of protecting self-determination, this was a sticky situation. The United States, for its part, was cautious about an engagement where the Russians might become involved.

The civil war predominantly featured Palestinian Arabs and Jews locked in guerrilla warfare. Less than a handful of Arab mercenaries and irregulars from the surrounding Arab countries came to assist the Palestinian Arabs, but their numbers were insignificant and their contribution to the cause even less so. The Zionist forces were comprised mainly of the Jewish defense force, Haganah, along with the LEHI and Irgun terrorist groups. The Zionists, on the whole, were far better trained and organized, and had a command structure that was part and parcel of their fairly developed political organization. The Palestinian Arabs, conversely, had remained practically leaderless since the Arab revolts of the 1930s. Though various members of leading Arab families assumed temporary roles here and there, they were usually corrupt, self-serving, and ineffective.

Nevertheless, for six months, bombs and ambushes raged throughout Palestine, assuming a provocation–reprisal pattern of violence, bloodshed, and terrorism. Women, children, and the elderly were frequently fair game, and both sides plumbed the depths of brutality. For the first half of the civil war the Arabs fought offensively, ambushing Jewish settlements and convoys. The Zionists fought defensively, holding their UN-designated territory intact. In April 1948 the Haganah, along with LEHI and Irgun forces, went on the offensive, ushering in the worst violence of the civil phase. The most atrocious and notorious Zionist attack, and also a watershed in the conflict (one that still reverberates), was the attack at Deir Yassin.

Lying five miles west of Jerusalem, the village of Deir Yassin was attacked on April 9 by joint Irgun–LEHI forces, and a smaller number of Haganah troops. Though the village had agreed to a non-aggression pact with Haganah and its Jewish neighbors to avoid such violence, 100–200 men, women, and children were killed; the bodies of many mutilated and thrown down wells.¹⁵ Some survivors of the village were then put in the back of trucks and paraded in the streets as showpieces.

The point in examining one Zionist onslaught is not for the sake of emphasizing Zionist terrorism; Arab fighters, too, carried out appalling acts on defenseless civilians during this period. But, aside from being an instance of savage atrocity, both the severity of Deir Yassin and its promulgation and propaganda by Arabs and Zionists alike created vast Arab panic. This terror and flight affected the demographics of the UN-designated territories along with the outcome of the war. As Arab radio stations broadcast news of Deir Yassin, Zionist forces in trucks with loudspeakers further terrorized Arab peasants and villagers with threats of similar violence. By the end of the civil phase of the war in 1948, 300,000 Arabs had fled their homes for other areas in Palestine, or entered surrounding Arab states.¹⁶ This was the start of a Palestinian refugee problem that changed the course of Palestinian–Israeli history and has yet to be resolved.

By April, Haganah troops were well in control, and by May the Palestinian guerrilla effort was in tatters. On May 14, 1948, the last of the British departed at the port of Haifa, bringing to an end three decades of Great Britain's colonial presence. That same day, at 4:00 p.m. in the Tel Aviv Museum, the Jewish leadership listened in person while the world did so by radio as Ben-Gurion declared the “establishment of the Jewish State in Palestine, to be called Medinath Yisrael (the State of Israel).”¹⁷

With trust in the Rock of Israel, we set our hands on this declaration at this session of the Provisional State Council in the city of Tel Aviv, on this Sabbath Eve, the fifth day of Iyar, in the year five thousand seven hundred and eight.¹⁸

David Ben-Gurion
May 14, 1948

The declaration of independence starts with a brief description of Jewish history, and then sets forth its principles – a hand extended in peace to its neighbors, cooperation with the UN – against a backdrop of justification for the state to exist. The declaration, according to historian Howard M. Sachar, notified the world that the Land of Israel was the historic birthplace of the Jewish people, that the Zionist movement was testimony to the role Palestine had fulfilled in Jewish history and religion, that the Balfour Declaration, the United Nations Partition Resolution, the sacrifice of the Zionist pioneers, and the torment suffered by Jews in recent years – all laid the moral and legal foundations for the new state.¹⁹

The first country to acknowledge Israel was the United States, which it did that day, the Russians quickly following suit. Zionism had become a reality.

INTERNATIONAL WAR AND THE BIRTH OF THE ARAB–ISRAELI CONFLICT

The allegory commonly used when describing the international phase of the 1948 war is that of David and Goliath. The Old Testament story (1 Samuel 17:1–58) describes an Israelite peasant boy doing battle with a mighty Philistine warrior named Goliath. David kills Goliath with a slingshot and goes on to become the king of Israel. This is tempting imagery, and on paper all of the Arab Middle East did attack 650,000 Jews, with Israel emerging the victor. But the reality of the 1948 war was something altogether different; the Israeli Defense Forces (IDF; Haganah's successor) were certainly a formidable, well-trained, and organized fighting force to be sure, but no one is that good. In reality the invading countries – Egypt, Jordan, Iraq, Syria, and a small number of soldiers from Saudi Arabia and Lebanon – sent approximately 23,000 troops into Palestine, and were met by 30,000–40,000 IDF troops.²⁰ These numbers would increase throughout the war, with Israeli increases being far more significant. In summary, all the Arab Middle East invaded Israel, and was not only outnumbered, but roundly defeated as well. So what does all this mean? A look through the lens of Arab politics provides the needed clarity.

Before the Zionists announced statehood, the previous two months were spent with the United States and the UN motivating the Jews and the Arabs to sign a truce. The hope was to put an official end to the civil war and prevent an international upheaval involving the surrounding Arab countries. Washington had cooled on the idea of partition in early 1948 and was kicking around the idea of a trusteeship for Palestine that would place all of it in the direct care of the UN. When the US-led initiative met dismay, it scrapped the trusteeship idea for a truce. In mid-April the UN Security Council voted on a truce plan, with Egypt in favor. The truce was rigidly rejected by David Ben-Gurion and King Abdullah of Transjordan: Ben-Gurion would not postpone declaration of statehood and wanted to avoid precise UN-defined boundaries in the case of a truce, and Abdullah's plans of annexing Palestine for himself did not fit within these parameters either. Aware of their military superiority – and Abdullah's willing compliance – the Zionists declared statehood.²¹

Note: The United Nations is an international body composed of many organizations and agencies that work in concert, as stated in the UN Charter, to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war,... to reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights,... to establish conditions under which justice and respect for the obligations arising from treaties and other sources of international law can be maintained, and to promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom.²²

Two of the UN's main bodies, which will receive frequent mentioning from here onwards, are the General Assembly and the Security Council. The General Assembly is the collective membership of the UN. When the UN was first established there were 51 member states; there are now 193. Among its duties are to discuss issues and make suggestions through resolutions. The Assembly's resolutions are not legally binding and have no power of enforcement. The Security Council, on the other hand, is mandated to "promote the establishment and maintenance of international peace and security." It is composed of 15 members – 5 permanent, and 10 rotating (originally 6). The permanent members are the United States, Great Britain, Russia, France, and China. Security Council resolutions are legally binding and enforceable. During a vote, any of the permanent members have the power to veto a resolution by simply voting against it.

Though the populations of the Middle East seethed with anger at the fate of the Palestinians – partition, defeat, and displacement – the governments were less than interested in war with Israel. They were locked in rivalries of power and preeminence with one another, and gave war with Israel hardly a serious thought. Aside from crumbling economies, domestic political instability, and competition for the position of leading Arab nation (especially between Transjordan and Egypt), Transjordan played a key role in international hesitancy to invade Israel. Seeking annexation of what was left of Palestine for itself, a secret non-aggression pact between Transjordan's King Abdullah and Israel was made one week before the UN partition.

In the pact, Abdullah promised Israel noninterference, and in return Israel granted Transjordan's annexation of UN-designated Palestine. Abdullah's plotted course was a step toward his plans for a "Greater Syria," which were neither secret nor popular with his Arab neighbors. It is also important to keep in mind that Transjordan was very much a British client state, whose military was commanded by a British officer, Sir John Bagot Glubb. Any plans Abdullah had of expanding his holdings were viewed as not only an obvious threat to the other Arab states, but also included British benefit with London's possible reinvolvement in the region. Transjordan had one ally in the region (Israel) and was surrounded by countries (its Arab neighbors) hostile to its plans for cooperation with the Zionists, its plans for territorial expansion at their expense, and its British servitude.²³ So the Arab states were torn with issues of (1) maintaining forces at home to keep order among unstable populations; (2) saving face in front of their domestic populations and consequently invading on the pretense of fighting for Palestine's honor; and (3) invading Israel just to keep Transjordan from walking away with Palestine. With the truces tossed out, overwhelming public support on both sides, Ben-Gurion's defiance, as well as Abdullah's determination to occupy UN-designated Palestine, the Arab countries invaded, initiating what Glubb later referred to as "a curious imitation of a war."²⁴

As one might predict, with a lack of cohesion, no plans, and insufficient troops, the Arab countries did not fare well in the conflict. (None of the Arab armies had fought a war before.)

The fighting that lasted from mid-May to July, with a flare-up in October after a three-month truce, produced a victorious Israel and a humiliated and limping Arab Middle East. Israel suffered the death of approximately 1 percent of its population, about 6,000 people, the majority of its military deaths resulting from offensive maneuvers.²⁵ When the dust settled, the 56 percent of Palestine the UN had allotted to the Zionists had been expanded to 78 percent. The 44 percent allotted to Palestine was cut in half, leaving 22 percent to the Palestinians (see map 2, p. 92).

During the first half of 1949 Egypt, Lebanon, Transjordan, and Syria signed armistices with Israel (all except for Iraq). In separate agreements, the remaining 22 percent of Palestine was divided up between Egypt and Transjordan. Egypt would assume control of Gaza, and Transjordan would be handed the part of UN-designated Palestine that lay along the west bank of the Jordan River. After the armistice, this portion of land became known as the “West Bank,” designating it as a mere extension of Transjordan, or what would become the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan, or Jordan for short. Abdullah actually went so far as to issue a decree banning the word “Palestine” from all official documents.²⁶

Note: The boundary of the 1949 armistice, distinguishing the West Bank and Gaza from Israel proper, has become known as the “Green Line.” This designation is the internationally recognized border that remains today.

The defeat of 1948 and allocation of Palestine to Egypt and Jordan marked the abandonment of the UN partition plan and the collapse of the independence the Palestinians so desired. To this day Palestinians refer to 1948 as al-Naqba (the Catastrophe, or Disaster). As the armistice agreements were being signed, the situation was this: Israel was a fixed and permanent reality, Palestinian sovereignty was a dream lying in ruin, and a state of no war–no peace took hold of the entire Middle East.

A NOTE ABOUT THE PALESTINIAN REFUGEES

Note: This section functions essentially as a large note. The subject of the refugee problem, created between 1947 and 1949, has brought disagreements in the historical literature. Below is a discussion of the facts and figures, and where scholars disagree as to the causes of these data.

A long-disputed issue has been the dispossession of hundreds of thousands of Palestinians from their homes during the civil and international phases of the 1948 war. Over the last two decades documents have been made available and serious research has been carried out and published on this subject revealing a great deal of new information.²⁷ Over the course of the war approximately 700,000 Palestinians fled or were forced from their homes and into Arab-held Palestine or the surrounding Arab countries. The remaining Arab population was distributed between Israel (150,000), the West Bank (400,000), and Gaza (60,000).²⁸ What remains in dispute to a degree are the causal elements that created the refugee problem. Historian Benny Morris suggests from his research that there was no explicit Zionist policy or master plan of expulsion before or during the war. Instead he maintains that, “while military attacks or expulsions were the major precipitant to flight, the exodus was, overall, the result of a cumulative process and a set of causes.”²⁹ Morris arrives at this assessment via analysis of declassified documents and an appraisal of the two poles of the argument, establishing his own position somewhere between the two.

According to Morris, “Arab and pro-Arab commentators” maintain that the refugee problem was the result of a “Zionist ‘master-plan’ of expulsion,” while “old-school Zionist commentators and historians” assert that the “sporadic talk among Zionist leaders of ‘transfer’ was mere pipe-dreaming and was never undertaken systematically or seriously.” Morris’s view is that talk of transfer among Zionists in the 1930s and early 1940s “was not tantamount to pre-planning and did not issue in the production of a policy or master-plan of expulsion.” However, he does maintain that “transfer was inevitable and inbuilt into Zionism – because it sought to transform a land which was ‘Arab’ into a ‘Jewish’ state and a Jewish state could not have arisen without a major displacement of Arab population.”³⁰

Some scholars contend that Morris has not gone far enough in how he judges the data, and suggest a higher degree of Zionist intent and premeditation.³¹ The general criticism is that Morris’s research provides proof for the existence of premeditated intent, and that his findings undermine his conclusions. While we are unable to fully address the ins-and-outs of the various arguments here, it is important to note a few contours of the problem.

In the early moments of the war some Jews tried to prevent flight, though upper- and middle-class Arabs having the resources to leave did so, and with the intention of returning when the violence subsided. This set a precedent for the peasant classes to emulate, as well as reduced personnel in schools and businesses, creating more incentive for peasants to leave. Yet, by April 1948, attacks like Deir Yassin were occurring and exodus was then as much due to fear as forced expulsion. Later, towns like Lydda and Ramleh were forcibly expelled in their entirety, rendering 50,000–60,000 people homeless in one fell swoop.³² Moreover, it is important to bear in mind that the notion of expelling the Palestinians was not a remote or recent consideration, especially at the elite level.

The issue of population transfer appears in the diaries, memoirs, and correspondence of top-level leadership throughout early Zionist history.³³ From Zionism’s earliest beginnings the problem of there being a native population in Palestine demanded a solution, as even Theodor Herzl commented in his diaries:

We must expropriate [confiscate] gently ... We shall try to spirit the penniless population across the border by procuring employment for it in the transit countries, while denying it any employment in our country ... Both the process of expropriation and the removal of the poor must be carried out discretely and circumspectly.³⁴

David Ben-Gurion shared an identical logic in a speech to the Twentieth Zionist Congress in 1937:

Transfer is what will make possible a comprehensive settlement programme. Thankfully, the Arab people have vast empty areas. Jewish power, which grows steadily, will also increase our possibilities to carry out the transfer on a large scale.³⁵

Given Zionism’s goal of forging a Jewish state in an Arab country, a solid Jewish majority was an obvious necessity, and standing in the way was a large Arab population and potential “fifth column” (subversive element). What evolved throughout the war was an increased realization of the benefits, and relative ease, of such methods. In other words, the war offered a bridge between theory and practice. As Morris summarizes:

By 1948, transfer was in the air. The transfer thinking that preceded the war contributed to the denouement [outcome] by conditioning the Jewish population, political parties, military organisations and military and civilian leaderships for what transpired. Thinking about the possibilities of transfer in the 1930s and the 1940s had prepared and conditioned hearts and minds for its implementation in the course of 1948 so that, as it occurred, few voiced protest or doubt; it was accepted as inevitable and natural by the bulk of the Jewish population.³⁶

Further evidence of this mindset is the policies preventing and denying the right of return for refugee populations. In 1948, once a village was emptied, it became common to loot and destroy it – or leave it intact depending on its quality, in order to make it available for Jewish immigrants. Refugees were and still are refused return, a position Israel continues to stand firm on, and a problem that still contributes to the current impasse.

THE ARAB–ISRAELI CONFLICT

Note: Now is as good a time as any to clarify this. When browsing books on the subject, you will notice that this conflict gets called all sorts of things: the Palestinian–Israeli conflict, the Zionist–Arab conflict, the Arab–Israeli conflict, and so on. Though not a critical issue, the wording can be confusing. The conflict within Israel and Palestine is the Palestine–Israel conflict, though other variants are acceptable, e.g., Israeli–Palestinian conflict, etc. The conflict that developed between Israel and the rest of the surrounding Arab countries (Egypt, Jordan, Syria, Lebanon, as well as Saudi Arabia and Iraq) is known as the Arab–Israeli conflict. I chose to focus on the conflict within, it being first and giving rise to the greater Arab–Israeli conflict. The label “Arab–Israeli conflict” can also detract from the actual issue; the larger, more general conflict tends to replace and obscure the conflict with the Palestinians. As we see in this section, the Palestinians are almost forgotten in the wake of the conflict between Israel and the rest of the Arab states.

The backdrop to this section (1949–56) is the Cold War. US and British determination to contain Soviet expansion into the Middle East played a key role in how these two nations dealt with the no war–no peace Middle East situation after 1948. In the foreground of this period, however, were Arab resentment and rivalry (which was typical), and Israeli militancy (which was becoming typical).

As noted, the Arab nations were not domestically stable before the war, and defeat by Israel did not help matters. For the younger generation this humiliation clearly indicated a lack of leadership. And the attendant dismay at both the elite and popular levels resulted in severe instability, and finally revolution. Syria’s leadership was overturned with one coup after another in the postwar period; King Abdullah of Jordan continuously attempted to establish a relationship with Israel, which led to his assassination by a Palestinian nationalist in 1951; and Egypt’s King Faruq was deposed in a bloodless coup that brought to power the young Colonel Gamal Abdul Nasser, the first leader of native Egyptian lineage to take sustained control in 2,000 years. Postwar Arab attention was primarily on domestic concerns, and secondarily on competition with one another – Israel and Palestine were, at this point, something of an afterthought, though for saving face before the Arab populations a posture of anti-Israeli belligerency was generally struck.

Conversely, Israel was aglow with confidence and defiance. But despite its recent military success, there still lingered the doubt over Arab desire to destroy Israel, and a general sense of vulnerability and isolation, creating a hyper-defensive mindset among the populace, and an assumed stance of aggressive defense, or “activism,” at the top levels of government. Charles D. Smith explains:

Israel's attitude toward the Arabs and its relations with the outside world were predicated on the Jewish experience in Europe, the Holocaust, and the Arab hostility it encountered in the Middle East. Whereas Jews had previously been subject to the will of non-Jews, Israel, as the Jewish state, would never submit to constraints imposed by others. In Ben-Gurion's view, Israel alone was responsible for its existence; though it might rely on outside help, economically and militarily, that would not signify its willingness to limit its independence in any way. For Ben-Gurion and those allied with him in the Israeli government, the opinions of the outside world meant little, regardless of the aid other countries might give. He made a nearly absolute distinction between Israel and world Jewry on the one hand, and the goyim, or non-Jews, on the other. If the latter did not fulfill their perceived obligations to Israel, they would be at best ignored, at worst be fought.³⁷

To this psychological make-up of the Middle East must be added Cold War politics.

There was a pronounced Anglo-American interest in establishing alliances that would serve as buffers to obstruct potential Soviet involvement in the region. Moreover, there was a fear that the instability of the Arab states would make them vulnerable to Soviet influence. One such alliance was called the Baghdad Pact (February 1955), which consisted of Great Britain, unofficial US sponsorship, Iraq, and the countries that seal the Soviet Union off from the Middle East, or the “northern tier” countries – Turkey, Iran, and Pakistan. Iraq was the only Arab country to belong to the alliance, for which it was severely criticized by Egypt's Nasser. In the Anglo-American effort to establish a Cold War Middle East bulwark, one country that was unwilling to cooperate was Egypt. Nasser opposed such pacts, interpreting them as further attempts to sustain Western control over the Middle East. His objective was pan-Arab independence, as he loathed British imperialism, still maintaining its presence in Egypt. With his support of Algeria's resistance to French occupation, contempt for Israel as an instance of Western colonialism, suspicion of US intervention, as well as hatred for Britain and imperialism in general, Nasser was needless to say unpopular in the West.

Just before the Baghdad Pact, Nasser made an agreement with London (July 1954, signed in October) for Britain to withdraw its military from bases in the Suez Canal Zone. The canal was a vital international route for ferrying freight in and out of the Mediterranean and had been under the military control of the British since 1882. Certain Israeli leaders viewed this agreement as a potential threat and attempted to discourage Britain's withdrawal. In response, Israeli military intelligence launched an operation involving a spy ring in Cairo, which would set off bombs at American and British embassies there and centers frequented by Westerners. The idea was to cause panic and doubt over Nasser's control of security and thus lead to the termination of the Anglo-Egyptian agreement. The operation (July 1954) never got off the ground. One of the agent's bombs ignited prematurely, ruining the plot and exposing the entire network. This incident became known as the Lavon Affair, named after Israel's defense minister, Pinhas Lavon.

The Lavon Affair had been planned and executed without the knowledge of the prime minister, Moshe Sharett, whose methods tended toward moderation and diplomacy compared to the activist elites around him. Sharett became prime minister in 1953 when Ben-Gurion went into retirement, but in early 1955 Ben-Gurion returned to government, replacing Lavon as defense minister. Eleven days after Ben-Gurion's return, Israeli paratroopers raided Egyptian military bases in Gaza. The rationale Israel gave for the raid was as a reprisal for infiltrations and attacks coming from Egyptian-controlled Gaza into Israel. Though tension and violence existed on Israel's borders (discussed in the next section) Israeli documents reflect a period of relative calm, making the raid into Gaza seem suspicious.³⁸ The source of the Gaza raid most likely came from both discord between Ben-Gurion and Sharett, and the desire to send Egypt a message and possibly provoke Nasser into response. As Sharett stated in his diaries shortly after the Gaza raid: The army spokesman, on instructions from the Minister of Defense, delivered a false version to the press: a unit of ours, after having been attacked supposedly inside our territory, returned the fire and engaged a battle which later developed as it did. Who will believe us?

He then goes on to say:

Who would be foolish enough to believe that such a complicated operation could 'develop' from a casual and sudden attack on an Israeli army unit by an Egyptian unit?³⁹

Secret contacts and attempts at diplomacy had been made between Sharett and Nasser, both of whom were interested in pursuing a level of agreement.⁴⁰ Nevertheless, the developments and consequent tension led to Nasser's increased hostility toward Israel and an arms race that ultimately brought with it war.

Nasser sought arms from Washington, but the Americans placed stipulations that he deemed unacceptable. In turn, Nasser successfully secured an arms deal from Moscow. At the same time, the Egyptian leader was embarking on a dam-building project on the Nile at Aswan, for which he needed financing. The United States, in an attempt to reestablish relations with Egypt, offered to provide economic assistance for the project. Though the offer was made, the Americans were losing patience with Egypt's nationalism and independent attitude; Eisenhower's secretary of state, John Foster Dulles, steered US policy in the Middle East at the time, and Nasser's noncompliance elicited Dulles's irritation. When Nasser proclaimed recognition of Communist China in May 1956, it was all the secretary could take. Shortly thereafter, Washington withdrew its support for the Aswan Dam project in an attempt to reprimand Cairo. The response was unexpected: Nasser decided to nationalize the Suez Canal. The canal was owned by an Anglo-French company, but the Egyptian leader was within his rights according to pertinent treaties and laws. The shareholders of the canal were promised compensation for their holdings and the canal's traffic went unhindered, and in some cases even improved.⁴¹ On top of this, Nasser had closed the Strait of Tiran at the tip of the Sinai Peninsula, denying transit of ships heading for Israel. The fuse had been lit.

THE SUEZ CANAL CRISIS (1956)

The Suez Crisis went something like this: Britain and France believed that control of the Suez Canal could be regained, and Nasser toppled, with the practical use of force. Israel joined the plan to teach Nasser a permanent lesson, and planning began for a British-French-Israeli invasion of Egypt. The scheduled attack revolved around favorable weather conditions, along with the two world superpowers being distracted – by an upcoming election (America's distraction), and rebellion in Hungary and Poland (Russia's distraction). The plan was for Israel to invade Egypt via the Sinai Peninsula, and upon reaching the canal London and Paris would issue an ultimatum for Israel and Egypt to withdraw their forces ten miles from the canal. Knowing that Nasser would hardly comply with such a demand, the two European forces would then descend upon the Suez Canal to "separate" the two Middle Eastern forces.

On October 29, 1956, Israeli paratroopers landed near the canal while other battalions under the command of Ariel Sharon made their way through Sinai and arrived at the Suez. Egypt engaged its troops; the ultimatum was issued from Britain and France; Egypt said no; Britain and France advanced their forces, bombing Egyptian airfields and landing at Port Said on the canal. On November 2, the UN General Assembly passed a resolution with near unanimity for a ceasefire and withdrawal of all invading forces. With harsh UN, US, and Soviet condemnation, France and Great Britain agreed to the resolution days later. Israel dismissed the resolution until it completed its entire capture of the Sinai Peninsula, whereupon it agreed to the ceasefire.

Nasser, though trounced, emerged a hero and a figure of Arab nationalism, while the invasion only hardened the Arab view of Israel as an agent of Western imperialism. Egypt also secured increased backing from Moscow, including support for the Aswan Dam. Israel, though condemned as an aggressor by Washington and the UN – and forced by both to withdraw from Gaza and Sinai – elevated its reputation as a formidable force on the international stage. UN Emergency Forces (UNEF) were placed in Gaza and the southern tip of Sinai to prevent border clashes, a presence that Egypt reserved the right to terminate. The Egyptian–Israeli border would remain quiet for the next decade. The relative ten-year calm that also fell over the region as a whole was, however, of the kind that precedes violent weather.

THE JUNE 1967 WAR (THE SIX-DAY WAR)

The years between 1957 and 1967 were comparatively quiet in the Arab–Israeli arena, though general agitation and rivalry carried on as usual between the Arab countries, on Israel’s border, and amongst the Israeli leadership. Over the course of the John F. Kennedy and Lyndon B. Johnson presidencies US–Israeli relations warmed considerably, including intelligence cooperation between the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) and Israel’s Mossad (its foreign intelligence agency, something like the CIA). The Cold War remained a factor, playing a role in augmented American support for Israel. (Johnson’s personal feelings on the matter, along with the sympathy of the American people, also played a significant part.) US economic aid to Egypt increased at first but declined over the course of the 1960s. While US support of Israel increased, so too did Soviet support of Egypt, Syria, and Iraq. Yet, Israel’s military superiority never wavered, and in addition to its arms acquisitions it began a program for developing nuclear weapons in the 1950s and 1960s with the aid of France, and eventually the United States.

Among the Palestinians the seeds of rebellion were sown with the formation of the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO), along with a smaller, more militant group called al-Fatah, the leaders of which included a young nationalist named Yasser Arafat. The PLO, which formed in May 1964, was mainly under the control of Nasser and was an organization lacking teeth and autonomy; the goal of alleviating the situation of the Palestinian refugees made for powerful speech-making, but the Arab countries were less than interested in acting on those sentiments. Fatah, on the other hand, operated with far greater ideological resolve. Though founded in 1958, it was not until 1964 that Fatah started infiltrating Israel in earnest to plant explosives. The group was influenced by Algeria’s uprising against the French and felt violence and militancy should precede diplomacy and politics.

Guerrilla infiltrations into Israel in general increased during the 1960s, especially along the borders of Jordan and Syria; the UN presence along the Egyptian border continued to discourage such activity there. The Israeli–Syrian border in particular became a hotbed of fighting, escalating to the use of artillery and fighter planes. Raids from Syria eventually led to a major, and curious, Israeli reprisal on the southern West Bank town of Samu (November 1966), where homes and public buildings were destroyed, with 18 people killed and 54 wounded.⁴² The attack was condemned by the UN and United States. Unlike Syria, the Jordanian government, which controlled the West Bank, instigated no guerrilla activity, though aggression still came from the Jordanian border. Still, the attack and subsequent condemnation for his inaction embarrassed Jordan’s King Hussein (Abdullah’s grandson), as well as Nasser, the face of Arab unity, for not defending an Arab state. Aside from the strategic value of contributing to intra-Arab rivalry, the attack on the Jordanian-controlled West Bank raised the question, even by supporters of Israel, about its grounds for doing so. Nevertheless, clashes continued on the Syria–Israel border, inching the region in the direction of another war.

Reports began to emanate from Damascus that the Israelis were massing troops in heavy concentration along the Syrian border, poised for imminent attack. Russia “confirmed” these reports, which escalated the tension and placed Nasser on high alert; Egypt and Syria, at Russian behest, signed a defense pact that would help protect Soviet objectives in the region. The reports of massing Israeli troops, however, were false. Later Syrian reconnaissance flights provided conclusive photos that revealed no such troop concentrations, and UN observers, too, confirmed the falsity of the claim. Though the reasoning behind Russian behavior here is uncertain, most assume that it feared an Israeli attack on Syria and thought a potential Egyptian response might encourage Israeli hesitation. Whether Nasser knew of the intelligence being bogus or not, he began assembling troops in Sinai. The Egyptian leader’s response is also an occasion for conjecture, but the notion of polishing up his image was probably not far from his mind. And then he took it the extra step.

To the shock of just about everyone, Nasser requested UNEF to withdraw from the Egyptian border and Sinai, as was his legal right according to the agreement after the Suez Crisis. Then, to an even greater shock – probably including Nasser’s – UN secretary general U Thant granted the request without question and pulled the UNEF troops from the region. Nasser immediately further militarized Sinai and closed once again the Strait of Tiran (May 22) to ships heading for or belonging to Israel. Syria, Jordan, and Iraq all began to mobilize in the event of hostility; Jordan’s Hussein even flew to Cairo (May 30) to sign a defense agreement with Egypt. The stage was set: Arab troops mobilized; Israeli troops also mobilized; belligerent speeches were made by Nasser; Israel’s terrified population feared a second Holocaust; and Israel’s IDF leadership was champing at the bit for war, though Prime Minister Levi Eshkol was much less so, at first. Israel invaded Egypt on the morning of June 5, 1967, and five days later it was all over – though one could say in three hours it was all over.

The June 1967 war, or the “Six-Day War” as the victors preferred to call it, was a pivotal event that has received much scholarly attention,⁴³ however, a quick synopsis here will serve our purposes: At 7:45 a.m. on that Monday, Israeli planes flying low and under the radar destroyed Egypt’s air force while it was still on the ground. Within three hours Israel had already maimed Egypt’s greatest threat. The rest was a clean-up. While Israeli troops took Gaza and eventually the entirety of Sinai over the next couple of days, they managed to destroy the air forces of Jordan and Syria. Israel offered Jordan a ceasefire during the first day on the condition that Jordan hold its reins and not engage in the conflict. King Hussein, who had already entered into a pact with Egypt, and whose country housed the bulk of the Palestinian refugees, had little choice but to attack and began shelling Israel. The IDF responded in full force. Over the course of June 6 and 7 (days two and three), Hussein sought a ceasefire. The UN responded with a Security Council resolution (233), but Israel continued its drive toward the Jordan River, dismissing the resolution, and by the end of June 7 had taken all of the West Bank along with all of Jerusalem. Then only did Israel acknowledge the ceasefire. On June 8, Egypt also accepted the ceasefire, along with Syria, whose involvement in the war had been insignificant. Israel decided to wait for its attack on Syria.

The Israelis were worried that the United States would try to prevent an attack on Syria. America was preoccupied with operations in Vietnam, as well as mindful of potential Soviet involvement in the Middle East owing to the war there, and an Israeli attack on Syria was too sensitive for US interests. Meanwhile, an American intelligence-gathering ship called the USS Liberty was stationed in the Mediterranean off the Sinai coast, monitoring the communications of the conflict. On June 8 (day four) unmarked planes, later identified as Israeli, rocketed and strafed the ship, along with dropping napalm canisters and destroying lifeboats, even after they had been deployed. Shortly after the air assault, Israeli torpedo boats attacked the ship's hull. The Liberty somehow did not sink through all of this, though in the course of two hours the ship had been utterly devastated. Thirty-four members of its crew were killed and over one hundred wounded. Israel extended its apologies, claiming it was a case of mistaken identity. The Johnson administration accepted Israel's apologies, keeping the story quiet at home.⁴⁴

As a result of the Liberty attack, American surveillance of Israeli plans in Syria, who had agreed to the UN ceasefire, was no longer an issue. On the same day, Israel initiated the air and artillery phase of its offensive. The day after (June 9, day five) Israel commenced a full invasion of Syria in violation of another UN ceasefire to which it had agreed. By June 10 Israel ended its assault, having acquired the Golan Heights, a portion of southwestern Syria on the Israeli border. The war was over and Israel was in control of Sinai, Gaza, the West Bank (including all of Jerusalem), and the Golan Heights. Egypt, Jordan, and Syria had been pulverized. Israel had tripled its size.

In the acquisition of Gaza and the West Bank, Israel came in control of 1.1 million Palestinians: 600,000 in the West Bank, 70,000 in East Jerusalem, and 350,000 in Gaza. (200,000 West Bank Palestinians had become refugees and fled or were expelled into Jordan.⁴⁵) Homes and villages of fleeing Palestinians were frequently demolished. In the Maghrabi Quarter facing the Western Wall in the Old City of Jerusalem, in one example, 135 homes were bulldozed and 650 people were evicted from the area to make way for a plaza for Jewish prayer in front of the wall. This type of action became routine throughout the occupied territories.⁴⁶

Ian J. Bickerton and Carla L. Klausner's summary of the June 1967 war is worth quoting in full:

The long-range causes of the 1967 war were the continued inability of the Arabs to recognize and accept the political sovereignty of the Jews in Israel; the antagonism and desire for revenge that had been fueled by defeats and humiliation in the previous wars, as well as by Israel's excessive retaliations; Arab fear of Israeli aggressiveness and expansionism; and Israeli "hawkishness" and the determination to maintain military superiority. The inability to find a solution for the plight of the Palestinian refugees, because of intransigence on both sides, provided the raison d'être [reason for being] and rallying point for the Arab crusade against Israel. The short-term and more proximate causes were the arms build-up on both sides in the previous decade; superpower interference and especially Soviet meddling; the volatile situation in Syria; Nasser's brinkmanship; the defense pacts that linked together Egypt, Syria, and Jordan; and the failure of the international community to prevent war through diplomacy. All sides thus must share the blame for the outbreak of hostilities and for the consequences that followed.⁴⁷

RESOLUTION 242

The end of the Six-Day War found Israel confident, reputed as a formidable power, and three times its previous size. As for the Arab countries, they had been flattened, militarily and morally. The immediate concern of everyone involved, including the region's sponsors in Washington and Moscow, was how to proceed with negotiations and peace settlements. The Israelis were willing to engage in direct negotiations (Arab-Israeli talks with no outside involvement) and relinquish their newly acquired land for peace and Arab recognition of Israel as a state – though this view would slightly cool with Israel's increased interest in retaining most of the territory. The Arabs wanted Israeli withdrawal to the pre-June 5 borders (Green Line), and to proceed with indirect third party negotiations involving the United Nations.

In August–September 1967 the Arabs held a summit in the Sudan capital of Khartoum. The summit sent a mixed signal, one of diplomacy and militancy, as well as arriving at the so-called “Three No's”: “no peace with Israel, no recognition of Israel, [and] no negotiations with it.”⁴⁸ Along with this rhetoric was included the contradictory mention of uniting “political efforts at the international and diplomatic level” to ensure Israeli withdrawal. The ambiguities at Khartoum allowed for the accommodation of disparate positions: those in support of inflexibility and militancy (Syria and the Palestinians), and those eager to negotiate a withdrawal (Egypt and Jordan). The need for ambiguity was also the order of the day at the UN.

After months of deliberation and revisions, the UN Security Council, on November 22, 1967, passed Resolution 242 (see p. 115). The gist of 242 is land-for-peace, or peace-for-land – the order was not established. What is called for is a “termination of all claims or states of belligerency and acknowledgement of the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of every state in the area.” Also stated is the “inadmissibility of the acquisition of territory by war,” calling for the “[w]ithdrawal of Israeli armed forces from territories occupied in the recent conflict.” In an earlier version of the resolution Israel was called upon to withdraw “from the territories occupied,” but this was altered in response to Israel's concerns about what it deemed the specificity of the word “the.” The wording was then revised to withdrawal “from territories occupied.” The Israelis viewed their obligations as withdrawal from some of the territories, therefore protecting their “right to live in peace within secure and recognized boundaries,” which was also included in the resolution. The Arab interpretation was withdrawal from all territories, period.

Differences in interpretation aside, Egypt, Jordan, and Israel signed the resolution, which became the basis for all peace efforts, and remains so today. For implementation of the resolution, the UN-assigned Swedish diplomat Gunnar Jarring had the unenviable task of bringing the involved parties to the table. As for the Palestinians, the only mention in 242 regarding their affairs is the urging of a “just settlement of the refugee problem.” Being relegated to a mere human rights issue, some Palestinians felt theirs was a political issue involving statehood and sovereignty, and now being subject to oppressive Israeli military occupation was all they could bear.

Map adapted from PASSIA, 2002

Note: UN 242 says what now? As historian Arthur Goldschmidt remarks, Resolution 242 “joined the Hussein–McMahon Correspondence and the Balfour Declaration in that gallery of ambiguous documents complicating the Arab-Israeli conflict.”⁴⁹ In essence the UN Security Council, under the influence of Washington and Moscow, came up with a document that was loose enough in its wording to make everyone happy (more or less). The Arabs are asked to recognize and get along with Israel, and Israel in turn is supposed to give back “territories occupied.” For Israel that meant some of the land, for the Arabs that meant all of the land, for the Security Council that meant all of the land, and for the United States that meant pretty much most of the land. The cornerstone of 242, however, is the “inadmissibility of the acquisition of territory by war,” which is fairly cut and dry. The Palestinians, in 242, are reduced to a “refugee problem.”

With the exception of Israel occupying the Sinai Peninsula, where we have just now left off is where the conflict remains, for all intents and purposes, to this very day.

UN 242⁵⁰

The Security Council,

Expressing its continuing concern with the grave situation in the Middle East,

Emphasizing the inadmissibility of the acquisition of territory by war and the need to work for a just and lasting peace in which every State in the area can live in security,

Emphasizing further that all Member States in their acceptance of the Charter of the United Nations have undertaken a commitment to act in accordance with Article 2 of the Charter,

1. Affirms that the fulfillment of Charter principles requires the establishment of a just and lasting peace in the Middle East which should include the application of both the following principles:

- (i) Withdrawal of Israeli armed forces from territories occupied in the recent conflict;
- (ii) Termination of all claims or states of belligerency and respect for and acknowledgement of the sovereignty, territorial integrity and political independence of every State in the area and their right to live in peace within secure and recognized boundaries free from threats or acts of force;

2. Affirms further the necessity

- (a) For guaranteeing freedom of navigation through international waterways in the area;
- (b) For achieving a just settlement of the refugee problem;
- (c) For guaranteeing the territorial inviolability and political independence of every State in the area, through measures including the establishment of demilitarized zones;

3. Requests the Secretary General to designate a Special Representative to proceed to the Middle East to establish and maintain contacts with the States concerned in order to promote agreement and assist efforts to achieve a peaceful and accepted settlement in accordance with the provisions and principles in this resolution;

4. Requests the Secretary-General to report to the Security Council on the progress of the efforts of the Special Representative as soon as possible.

The Continuation of the Arab–Israeli Conflict: 1967– Lebanon 1982

Note: Once again, a state of no war–no peace existed in the Middle East. With Resolution 242 floating in space, and no real agreement between Israel and its Arab neighbors holding anything together (even as a mere formality), things were tense and undefined. Israel was in the power position, and with its newly acquired territories and a healthy stream of support coming from the United States, it was content with the new status quo. The Arab countries, especially Egypt, were smoldering with defeat and humiliation and, refusing to negotiate from the weaker position, sought further Soviet armaments. As for superpower relations, things thawed slightly between Washington and Moscow. Though arms flowed into the Middle East, and interests in the region remained constant, their involvement with the Arab–Israeli conflict did back off to a degree. All the same, the title of the present chapter gives it away, and over the course of six years we add 1969 and 1973 to the list of 1948, 1956 (Suez), and 1967 (Six-Day War).

THE PLO AND PALESTINIAN NATIONALISM

The Palestinians were coming into viewing themselves as a political entity in the modern sense, quickly leaving behind the notion of being only part of a larger Arab whole. By “Palestinians” we include here not only the roughly one million people living in the West Bank and Gaza under Israeli occupation, but also the refugee population living in camps along Israel’s borders. Coming under Israeli control after the Six-Day War, the Palestinians had a deepened sense of identity. While living under Jordan and Egypt in the West Bank and Gaza was far from a perfect situation, it was still Arab rule and was not likely to change. With Israeli occupation (far worse than prior Arab control), however, came the possibility of not being under Israeli occupation. Given Israel’s withdrawal, called for in Resolution 242, the Palestinians could achieve what had been promised them under both the British mandate and the 1947 UN partition.

Not long after the June 1967 war, the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO) started to evolve into a serious and unified front. Its puppet leadership, hand-picked by Egypt’s Gamal Abdul Nasser, resigned under pressure (December 1967) and was supplanted by a guerrilla organization that wished to attract international attention and engage the situation in commando-style fashion. The PLO and the resistance movement in general quickly built up both a reputation and a following. In March 1968, Israel heavily attacked the Jordanian town of Karameh, a Palestinian camp and guerrilla headquarters for Fatah, in response to an Israeli bus that had been blown up by a mine. Though Fatah was ultimately defeated, it put up an intense fight, with Israel sustaining relatively high casualties and loss of equipment. The battle at Karameh became an instant legend among Arabs, and thousands of young Arab nationalists flocked to Fatah and the resistance movement, wanting to join the ranks of the commandos, or fedayeen (“those who sacrifice themselves”). Fatah and the PLO began to grow, and with growth came increased independence. In its host countries, especially Jordan, the PLO became what is commonly described as a state-within-a-state.

Four months after Karameh, the governing body of the PLO, the Palestine National Council (PNC), convened in Cairo and amended their original charter. The revised charter of July 1968 stated clearly the PLO’s intent for full-fledged revolution: “Armed struggle is the only way to liberate Palestine.” “Commando action constitutes the nucleus of the Palestinian popular liberation war.” Some other excerpts from the charter:

- Palestine, with the boundaries it had during the British Mandate, is an indivisible territorial unit.
- The Palestinians are those Arab nationals who, until 1947, normally resided in Palestine regardless of whether they were evicted from it or have stayed there. Anyone born, after that date, of a Palestinian father – whether inside Palestine or outside – is also a Palestinian.
- The Jews who had normally resided in Palestine until the beginning of the Zionist invasion will be considered Palestinians.
- The partition of Palestine in 1947 and the establishment of the state of Israel are entirely illegal, regardless of the passage of time, because they were contrary to the will of the Palestinian people....
- [Zionism] is racist and fanatic in its nature, aggressive, expansionist, and colonial in its aims, and fascist in its methods.¹

Though the language of the charter is at times ambiguous about the PLO’s ultimate goal for Palestine, it states unequivocally its aim to “destroy the Zionist and imperialist presence.” Other statements endeavored to soften this stance over the following decade, suggesting that Israelis could stay as Palestinian citizens once they rejected Zionism.² The different organizations and factions within the PLO made it difficult to produce a straightforward manifesto of precise intentions.³

The next year (1969), Yasser Arafat, the leader of Fatah, was elected chairman of the PLO and remained in that position until his death on November 11, 2004. Fatah at this point was the preeminent PLO guerrilla organization, in size and status. But, along with Fatah, there were a number of other groups such as the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP) and the Popular Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PDFLP). These groups, unlike Fatah, preferred to conduct revolution in the Arab world as a whole, not just in Palestine. The PFLP and the PDFLP, among others, hijacked airplanes and committed acts of terrorism in an effort to further their cause and bring the Palestine question to international attention. This militancy would eventually result in an Arab–Arab confrontation.

The PLO soon began to wear out its welcome in Jordan. Raids inside the occupied territories and Israel proper brought stiff Israeli reprisals, something King Hussein wanted to avoid. Between the Israeli–Jordanian border becoming hot with attacks and counter-attacks, and the subsequent pressure on Hussein, violence erupted between the Jordanian army and PLO members, mostly the PFLP. The clashes escalated and the PFLP hijacked three Western commercial aircraft (September 1970), landed them in Amman, and after emptying them of hostages blew the aircraft up as a final slap in the face to Hussein. What followed was a small-scale war in Jordan.

During the course of that month, Syrian battalions approached Jordan to aid the fedayeen. In a strange twist of developments, the United States urged Israel to intervene in defense of Jordan in order to discourage Syrian advance. Upon Israel's movement in that direction, Syria stopped in its tracks. The Jordanian army finished the war, ending with the PLO forces taking a severe beating, and the civilians in the camps a worse one. With thousands dead (most of whom were civilians), a ceasefire not worth the paper it was printed on was negotiated by Nasser and signed by the PLO and Jordan. The Cairo Agreement, as it was called, drew hostilities to an official close on September 27. (Nasser died of a heart attack the next day.) The civil war in Jordan would be remembered as Black September.

Though skirmishes continued over the next few months, in less than a year Hussein finally pushed the PLO out of Jordan. The next base of operation for the Palestinians was Lebanon, which would contribute to the breakdown of that already unstable country, as we will see later in the chapter.

THE WAR OF ATTRITION (1968–70), DIPLOMACY

Note: Though we just ended with the events of 1970, we need to go back for a moment and look at what was going on in the Arab–Israeli conflict, in particular Egypt, Israel, and their respective sponsors, Moscow and Washington.

At the end of the 1967 war Israel occupied, among other territories, the east bank of the Suez Canal in Sinai. With Israel on the right side of the channel and Egypt on the left, the situation was potentially volatile. Israel stood inflexibly on its position and resisted Gunnar Jarring's peace mission to the region. The UN sent Jarring as a mediator to facilitate a diplomatic settlement, where he encountered Egyptian and Jordanian openness to talks. Egypt, recovering from the war and receiving heavy shipments of Russian weaponry, wanted Sinai and Gaza back and knew that by coercion it could either bring about a political solution, or successfully regain the territory militarily. Nasser chose not to mince words: "What was taken by force must be restored by force."⁴ In October 1968, Egypt shelled Israeli positions across the canal, sent commandos on raids, and sank an Israeli destroyer off the Sinai coast. Israel reciprocated by shelling the Egyptian side of the canal, with the Israeli Defense Forces (IDF) sending air raids deep into Egyptian territory. These ongoing tit-for-tat hostilities became known as the War of Attrition.

Heavy artillery bombardments, commando raids, and eventual aerial warfare continued, with months turning into years. As the conflict grew in intensity, Nasser flew to Moscow (January 1970) and secured not only more armaments, but Russian pilots to fly the Soviet-supplied aircraft; the Israeli Air Force thus became involved in dogfights with Soviet pilots. Clearly, all the necessary ingredients for the development of a full-scale war were in place, but the Israelis, the Russians, and the Americans all knowing this, made attempts to prevent it.

Richard Nixon entered the White House in January 1969, and his secretary of state, William Rogers, proposed the Rogers Plan (December 1969) during US–Soviet talks that year over concerns about the War of Attrition. The Rogers Plan was based on Resolution 242, with mention of Israeli withdrawal, mutual recognition, solving the refugee problem, and a resumption of Jarring's diplomatic efforts. Though the Soviets at first rejected the plan, as did the Israelis who were particularly dismayed, agreement was achieved from all parties. The plan was signed by Egypt and Israel (July 1970), and a 90-day ceasefire began the following month. Israel did so hesitantly, only after the White House confirmed that it would not be subjected to American pressure regarding UN 242.⁵ Not long after the signing, Egypt began to move Soviet-supplied surface-to-air missiles (SAMs) to the canal zone, in violation of the ceasefire; the Israelis in return refused involvement in the Jarring talks.

In the War of Attrition Egypt took the worst of it by far, but interpreted its performance as successful having fought a continued fight with Israel.⁶ At the same time, the Israelis, despite a superior showing against larger numbers and increasing support for Egypt by the Soviets, felt a lull in morale and made every effort to downplay back home the stiff competition they had met. Yet, irrespective of interpretation, thousands were dead, severe financial costs had been incurred, and, after Nasser's death on September 28, 1970, the Arab-Israeli conflict found itself pretty much right back where it started after June 1967.

THE 1973 WAR (THE YOM KIPPUR WAR)

Nasser's death ushered in the era of his vice president, Anwar Sadat, who succeeded him as president. Egypt's economy was in tatters, and the incurred difficulties of 1967 and the expenses of the War of Attrition – casualties, destruction, and financial strains – did not help matters in the least. Though less focused on issues of pan-Arab nationalism than Nasser had been, Sadat was no less interested than his predecessor in negotiating a peace settlement and regaining the territory lost to Israel. Under US pressure from Secretary Rogers and the State Department, Gunnar Jarring resumed his diplomatic activities trying to facilitate a peace settlement.

In 1971 Jarring began his renewed bid, to which Egypt and Jordan had responded favorably, both willing to sign peace treaties with Israel based on withdrawal and UN 242. In addition to Jarring's mission, Sadat, in February 1971, extended a peace initiative of his own in Israel's direction, based on security, recognition, and withdrawal. In response to the Jarring mission as well as Sadat's peace offer, Israel (under its then-prime minister, Golda Meir) held its reins in rejectionist silence.⁷ Even at US and UN urging, Israel would not budge on the issue of withdrawal. A senior member of the US State Department would express what probably reflected the international consensus: "Israel will be considered responsible for the rejection of the best opportunity to achieve peace since the establishment of the state."⁸ It should be noted that US diplomatic efforts in 1971 worked against opposition emanating from the Nixon White House. Nixon's then-national security adviser, Henry Kissinger (who became secretary of state in 1973), encouraged Israeli resistance to Jarring and Sadat in hopes of stalling matters and getting Sadat to soften his stance. Kissinger hoped it would encourage Sadat to abandon Soviet sponsorship and in turn give the United States greater control of the region.⁹ However, it must also be noted that the USSR served as no obstacle to peace, as historian Avi Shlaim summarizes:

Although the Soviet Union was allied to the Arab radical regimes, it never questioned Israel's right to exist and indeed offered to guarantee Israel within the pre-1967 borders. Like America, the Soviet Union took Resolution 242 to mean an Israeli withdrawal to the old borders with only minor modifications. Unlike America, the Soviet Union strictly rationed the supply of arms to its allies in the region. In fact, the Soviets' refusal to give Egypt a military option against Israel led Sadat to expel all Soviet advisers in 1972. All the available evidence suggests that following Sadat's rise to power there was opportunity for a negotiated settlement. The chance was missed not because of the Soviet stand but as a result of Israeli intransigence backed by global strategists in the White House.¹⁰

The year 1971, which Sadat declared the “year of decision,” came and went, and by 1972 the deadlock remained. For Sadat, the decision to exercise his military option began to replace attempts at diplomacy – he would break the deadlock one way or another.

At first Sadat met with a lukewarm Soviet response to his requests for newer hi-tech weaponry. After a number of trips to Moscow and meeting with no success – late shipments, wrong supplies – Sadat retaliated by ejecting Russian advisors from Egypt (July 1972), to the surprise of the Soviets, Washington, and Israel. Sadat was sending Russia a sort of wake-up call, additionally giving the United States and Israel the impression that Egypt was looking to change its diplomatic course. His gamble worked, and as the United States stepped up shipments of fighter-bombers to Israel, Moscow began sending Egypt fighter jets, SAMs, and tanks; the Soviets did not want to lose their client. In the United States, presidential elections were nearing, and the Nixon White House was soon to become distracted by scandal (Watergate). Throughout all of this, Kissinger, who by 1973 was more or less running the country, felt the stalemate in the Middle East would hold out longer. It did not.

Over the spring of 1973 Sadat got to work, bringing Syria on board, a very willing partner in this endeavor, and one that had not signed 242. On October 6, Egypt and Syria attacked Israeli forces in Sinai and the Golan Heights, respectively. The ensuing war would become known as the Yom Kippur War, as the attack took place on the Day of Atonement, the holiest day on the Jewish calendar; for the Arabs it was Ramadan (the Muslim month of fasting). The day of attack also coincided with the anniversary of Muhammad’s first military victory, at the Battle of Badr (624 CE). However, it should remain clear that this war had nothing to do with religion for those pulling the strings, and rarely does it ever.

Self-assured from its 1967 victory and viewing the Arabs as incompetent and unlikely to risk another war, Israel dismissed the warning signs. Though Israeli intelligence had pieced together the likelihood of what was to come, it was not until the midnight prior to the attacks that agents phoned in the fact that war was imminent. Israel’s leadership finally took seriously what it had until now ridiculed, albeit somewhat late. That morning (October 6) Golda Meir and Defense Minister Moshe Dayan discussed the options and decided that it was best not to launch a preemptive attack. Not wanting to risk losing American aid, they feared the Arabs might claim self-defense when they invaded the occupied territory. Syria and Egypt attacked that afternoon. At 2:00 p.m., Operation Badr was unleashed.

With fierce fighting that overwhelmed the Israelis, Egypt crossed the Suez Canal while Syria entered the Golan Heights. Over the first week the Arabs were coordinated and focused; the Israelis had never seen such intense fighting. Though overrun at first, the IDF eventually got its footing and turned the tide. A contributing factor to how the war played out was superpower involvement. In the first week Israel suffered significant equipment loss and turned to the United States for more supplies. Kissinger hesitated at first. He worried about provoking an Arab oil embargo (a prohibition of commerce), as well as provoking the Russians.¹¹ However, it was a massive Soviet rearmament of Egypt that spurred Washington to respond with unprecedented airlifts to Israel. In turn, the Arab oil-producing countries countered the US airlifts (which included a $2.2 billion aid package given to Israel) with an oil embargo against the Americans and any European nations aiding Israel and the United States. The shipments to Israel continued regardless. By the end of the war Israel pushed Syria back, claiming more of the Golan Heights than it started with. At the canal the Egyptians came up against penetration of their offense whereupon the IDF crossed over to the canal's west bank and entered mainland Egypt.

The combatants rejected early attempts at a ceasefire, until the United States and the USSR threatened direct involvement. Moscow contacted Kissinger to negotiate ceasefire terms on October 21. The two came to an agreement, and the following day the Security Council passed Resolution 338 in a unanimous vote, with China abstaining:

The Security Council

1. Calls upon all parties to the present fighting to cease all firing and terminate all military activity immediately, no later than 12 hours after the moment of the adoption of this decision, in the positions they now occupy;
2. Calls upon the parties concerned to start immediately after the cease-fire the implementation of resolution 242 (1967) in all of its parts;
3. Decides that, immediately and concurrently with the ceasefire, negotiations shall start between the parties concerned under appropriate auspices aimed at establishing a just and durable peace in the Middle East.¹²

Sidestepping the UN and the Soviet Union, Kissinger engaged in "shuttle diplomacy," negotiating directly with the various leaders in Cairo (Sadat); Jerusalem (Meir); Damascus (Hafiz al-Assad); Riyadh, Saudi Arabia (King Faisal); and Amman, Jordan (Hussein). Over 1974 and 1975 the secretary managed to secure partial land-for-peace agreements between the three involved countries; Israel made limited withdrawals from Sinai and the Golan in exchange for Arab pledges of nonbelligerency. The two accords – Sinai I and Sinai II – were achieved in October 1974 and January 1975. But the diplomatic momentum stopped there, and would not resume until 1977.

Israel emerged the victor, for what it was worth. Losses were heavy all around, and though Israel scored a technical military victory (though not by much) the shock of the war was significant. Previously held assumptions were called into question, with popular resentment and anger soaring to unprecedented levels in the country's history. After an internal commission of inquiry – the Agranat Commission – a number of senior officials in the military and intelligence departments were dismissed. In the spring of 1974 Golda Meir and Moshe Dayan announced their resignations. Conversely, Egypt had scored a psychological and political victory. Sadat's plan to bring his territorial concerns to international attention had worked, and though this cost him a military defeat, he returned a sense of satisfaction to his country as well as adding a feather to his own cap. The United States ended up the sole power-player in the region, having secured a newfound relationship with Egypt, Moscow's primary client in the Middle East.

THE CAMP DAVID ACCORDS (1978)

Note: From the end of the previous section until now there has been a turnover in leadership. After Golda Meir resigned, Yitzhak Rabin held the position of prime minister until 1977. Rabin was then succeeded by Menachem Begin, the former leader of the Irgun terror squad. Gerald Ford replaced Richard Nixon in August 1974 after Nixon resigned under what was imminent impeachment for the Watergate scandal. The 1976 elections ushered in the Jimmy Carter administration. But as of the same year Egypt was still under Anwar Sadat's charge. That all said, our key players in this section are: President Jimmy Carter of the United States, Prime Minister Menachem Begin of Israel, and President Anwar Sadat of Egypt.

With new leadership came new philosophies and approaches that would end up redefining the Arab–Israeli conflict. Carter brought to the White House the hope of settling the conflict with sit-down multilateral (group) negotiations to work toward a comprehensive settlement – a sharp departure from Kissinger’s method of step-by-step diplomacy. Sadat, as we have discussed, was consistently and primarily interested in Egypt’s economic woes and the return of Sinai, and was eager to recommence with negotiations. The changes in Israel saw a sharp turn toward hard-line conservative thinking. Begin and his Likud party emphasized their intention to retain the West Bank and Gaza, referring to the former as “Judea and Samaria” and proclaiming it an integral part of Eretz-Israel, or biblical Israel – “between the Sea and the Jordan [River] there will only be Israeli sovereignty.”¹³ Though colonial settlements had been developed in the occupied territories since 1967 under previous Labor party governments, Likud made settlements a focal point. Over the first two years under Likud the number of settlers doubled, from under 5,000 to 10,000.¹⁴ Despite their differences of perspective, the two Middle Eastern leaders entered round-table talks facilitated by the American president, after his efforts for comprehensive agreement had failed.

Note: The issue of Israeli settlements in the occupied territories will continue to crop up throughout the rest of the book. Settlements are simply housing and land developments where civilians from the “occupying power” take up residence in the occupied territories. Transfer of a civilian population into occupied territory is a contravention of international law. The UN upholds the following two documents in its assertion that settlement of an occupied state or territory is illegal: (1) the Geneva Convention Relative to the Protection of Civilian Persons in Time of War (August 12, 1949), and (2) the Hague Convention IV of 1907.¹⁵

Carter convened a multilateral meeting of the United States, USSR, Israel, Jordan, and Egypt. At first he indicated a wish to include the PLO and made mention of a Palestinian “homeland,” though he maintained the PLO would have to acknowledge UN 242, something the Palestinians refused to do owing to its lack of any mention of Palestinian independence and sovereignty. After intense Israeli and domestic pressure, Carter backed off.¹⁶ What then followed was a US–Soviet joint communiqué (October 1, 1977) to set the groundwork for a comprehensive peace conference. The communiqué was patterned in substance and style after 242, calling for settlement of the conflict, a resolution of the Palestine question that ensured the “legitimate rights of the Palestinian people,” and Israeli withdrawal from “territories occupied” in the June 1967 war. Though Sadat and the Arabs were unenthusiastic – there was no mention of the PLO, and the wording was obviously constrained – they agreed to it. Israel rejected it outright. After a meeting between Carter’s people and Israeli foreign minister Moshe Dayan (former defense minister), a separate US–Israeli joint communiqué was issued stating: “Acceptance of the Joint US–USSR Statement of October 1, 1977, by the parties is not a prerequisite” for the convening of the conference.¹⁷ With things off to a slightly ludicrous start, Sadat decided that if he wanted peace and the Sinai back, and in a reasonable timeframe so as to attend to Egypt’s failing economy, he had to go it alone.

In a speech to the Egyptian National Assembly on November 9, Sadat announced, with Yasser Arafat in the audience, that he was willing to go to Jerusalem and discuss the matter with Begin in the Israeli parliament (the Knesset) itself. The Egyptian president arrived in Jerusalem ten days later as Begin's invited guest. The talks and meetings led to nothing conclusive or tangible, and eventually back to the same impasse. Sadat pressed for withdrawal from the occupied territories, including Sinai, and self-determination and statehood for the Palestinians, essentially reiterating his 1971 offer. Begin offered partial withdrawal from Sinai and total inflexibility regarding the West Bank and Gaza. The talks ground to a standstill. Sadat's trip did help to readjust the atmosphere between the two countries, with Begin also traveling to Egypt in return. If any harm came of these meetings it was by way of Arab anger (mainly from Syria and the PLO) directed against Sadat for "selling out" by moving in the direction of a separate peace. In July 1978 Carter invited Begin and Sadat to the Camp David presidential retreat in Maryland.

The turbulent Camp David talks spanned just under two weeks (September 5–17), ending with the signing of two accords, or "frameworks," on the last day. The first addressed the issue of the West Bank and Gaza, calling upon Egypt, Israel, Jordan, and "representatives of the Palestinian people" to negotiate the resolution of the "Palestinian problem in all its aspects." A five-year transitional period was established for determining the "final status" of these territories with a self-governing authority established to oversee administration during the transitional period. The second accord was a draft proposal for a treaty between Egypt and Israel to be signed within three months. This accord established the "withdrawal of Israeli armed forces from the Sinai," and the "right of free passage by ships of Israel through the Gulf of Suez and the Suez Canal."¹⁸ After continued difficulties regarding particulars and semantics, the treaty's ceremonial signing took place at the White House on March 26, 1979.¹⁹

The Camp David Accords brought peace between Egypt and Israel. However, beyond this bilateral peace, the Arab–Israeli conflict continued. The West Bank and Gaza were left to final-status determination; the PLO received no mention; the issue of East Jerusalem being occupied and annexed by Israel was not addressed, nor was the Golan Heights issue. This lack of a comprehensive peace settlement brought with it Arab condemnation of Sadat as a fraud. Israel agreed to withdraw from Sinai, in exchange for peace (as well as continued occupation of the remaining territories); Begin interpreted "autonomy" for Palestinians, called for in the frameworks, as applying to the people and not the land. But as the region continued to degenerate, as we will soon see, the Egyptian–Israeli peace agreements held together, and still do to this day.

THE PLO AND PALESTINIAN NATIONALISM, PART II

Throughout the 1970s the PLO grew in reputation and recognition. Though still fractured and heterogeneous, Arafat attempted to steer the organization toward moderation and unity. Regardless of his efforts, the PLO was plagued with internal disputes among its divergent factions, as well as the violence and terrorism that it became notorious for in northern Israel and at the international level. Arafat did make diplomatic strides, and by 1974 the PLO was recognized at the Arab summit in Rabat, Morocco, in October of that year. The Rabat Declaration affirmed the right of the Palestinian people to "establish an independent national authority” under the PLO, which was to be their “sole legitimate representative.”²⁰ A month later, Arafat was invited to New York to speak in front of the UN General Assembly.

On November 13, Chairman Arafat addressed the assembly with a review of Palestinian history, condemning Zionism as colonial and racist, and speaking about the hope of Jews and Arabs one day living in the “framework of a just peace in our democratic Palestine.” He then closed his speech with a now-famous admonition: “Today I have come bearing an olive branch and a freedom-fighter’s gun. Do not let the olive branch fall from my hand.”²¹ (His holster was empty, but the point was made.) A little over a week after Arafat’s address the General Assembly passed two resolutions, 3236 and 3237. The first affirmed the Palestinian “right to self-determination without external interference” and “the right to national independence and sovereignty.” It also stated the “right of the Palestinians to return to their homes and property from which they have been displaced and uprooted.” The second resolution conferred “observer status” (within the UN) upon the PLO.²² Needless to say, Israel and its supporters were furious. The General Assembly the next year passed Resolution 3379 (November 1975). This resolution determined that “zionism is a form of racism and racial discrimination,” equating it with apartheid South Africa, the legally sanctioned policy of racial segregation in force in that country from the 1950s to the 1990s.²³ The resolution was repealed in 1991.

The PLO’s achievements in the realm of international diplomacy reflected both its movement toward a more moderate stance and a changing international consensus. The resolutions passed in the General Assembly in 1974–75 indicated a larger UN, one more globally composed and not confined to looking through a predominantly European prism, though Western Europe started to change its stance as well. And while the PLO garnered its newfound attention, so too did the West Bank and Gaza. As Israel’s occupation and settlement policy continued, political consciousness in the territories grew by leaps and bounds, the vast majority of its citizens desiring independent statehood. A 1982 poll taken in Time magazine revealed that 98 percent of the people in the occupied territories wanted a state, while 86 percent thought the PLO should govern that state.²⁴ But as noted, by the mid-1970s the PLO had pitched camp in Lebanon after being expelled from Jordan, joining the more than 250,000 Palestinian refugees already there, and eventually running the refugee camps.²⁵ Not long after, the PLO found itself involved in the civil war there, the violence of which was merely an overture for the massive destruction that was to come.

ISRAEL’S INVASION OF LEBANON (1982)

Note: The outset of the 1980s saw, again, a turnover in leadership. The 1980 US elections brought the defeat of Jimmy Carter and the inauguration of the Ronald Reagan administration, along with a new secretary of state, Alexander Haig. The 1981 elections in Israel resulted in the re-election of the Menachem Begin government, which brought with it Ariel Sharon to the position of minister of defense. That year also witnessed the assassination of Anwar Sadat by Egyptian extremists who were displeased with their president’s domestic and foreign policies. Sadat’s vice president, Hosni Mubarak, replaced the assassinated leader.

This section involves the culmination of a few issues, namely: (1) the increasing tension in the West Bank and Gaza owing to Israeli occupation and the continued policy of settlement construction in the territories; (2) a civil war in Lebanon, the origin of which goes back to the late 1950s and reached a critical point in the mid-1970s; and (3) the PLO's rise to prominence and global recognition. To summarize, the PLO established its headquarters in Lebanon, making Israel's north border a site of hostility and frequent attacks. Israel, wishing to retain control of the occupied territories, had no desire to deal with the PLO at all, as Arafat and company represented the idea of Palestinian statehood. Lebanon, boiling with domestic instability, was under the leadership of a minority group, the Maronite Christians, who desperately wanted to hold on to power. Israel and the Maronites struck a deal. Israel would help push the PLO and occupying Syrian forces out of Lebanon and guarantee Maronite authority. In return, Lebanon would enter into a peace treaty with Israel and essentially become a client state. In Begin's perspective, this action would achieve the destruction of the PLO and therefore the Palestinian desire for statehood, while also creating a secure northern border. This is not how it would play out, as we will now see when we add 1982 to our 1948–1956–1967–1969–1973 list: on average, a war every six years.

Lebanon's multiethnic political fabric began to rend in 1975. The Maronite Christians met rising dissent from the majority Muslim population who felt the disproportionate makeup of the government should be adjusted. This opposition, called the Lebanese National Movement (LNM), was a patchwork of different political and ethnic groups. (Though it is inviting to see the lines drawn according to religion, it is important to keep in mind that Lebanon's unrest was born of political and economic concerns.) The LNM was largely Muslim, though there were Christian members, and likewise the ruling elite, mostly Christian, also had Muslim elements. In April 1975 civil war broke out and lasted over a year. The LNM sympathized with the PLO, and the Palestinians soon joined the fight against the Maronites. While the civil war raged on, each side received foreign support. The LNM–PLO had the backing of Syria, while Israel provided aid to the Maronites. However, the successes of the LNM–PLO alliance against the Maronites began to concern Syria; with the potential overthrow of the Maronite government, the Israelis would undoubtedly become directly involved. So the Syrians shifted loyalties and began to support the Maronites. (Yes, Israel and Syria were both supporting the same side.) Maronite forces eventually regained their losses and the fighting continued until October 1976, when a ceasefire was formalized in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia. Syria, as part of the accord, sustained the presence of its military occupation force in Lebanon, and reshifted its loyalty back to the LNM–PLO opposition. The civil war was vicious, resulting in tens of thousands dead, mostly civilians including women, children, and the elderly.²⁶ Nothing was resolved; indeed things were only made worse, while political divisions drew deeper and wider.

Israel remained focused on the obliteration of the PLO, whose popularity was growing in the West Bank, and who might eventually emerge as a force to be reckoned with in the diplomatic arena. The policies of the Begin government were crystal clear in terms of its intentions in the territories: annexation, and suppression of nationalism. Going after the PLO was, for Begin and Sharon, the next logical step. PLO attacks on targets just over the northern border of Israel continued (1977–81), as they had throughout the 1970s. It was also at this time that Israel entered into agreements with the Maronite leadership regarding further direct involvement in Lebanon. The Israelis developed a proxy, or substitute, army in South Lebanon, comprised mostly of Christians and led by Saad Haddad. This militia, the South Lebanese Army (SLA), would battle the PLO in place of the IDF.

In March 1978, PLO commandos hijacked a bus near Haifa. A shootout occurred, resulting in the deaths of six Palestinians and 34 Israelis.²⁷ Israel's response was a full-scale invasion of South Lebanon. Its first direct military venture in Lebanon – Operation Litani – began on March 15 and spanned a week of bombing and shelling, claiming mostly civilian lives and causing 100,000 people to flee their homes.²⁸ Following the invasion, Israel occupied South Lebanon for three months. The UN Security Council passed a resolution (425) calling for Israel's withdrawal, and deployed a peacekeeping force, the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon (UNIFIL), to form a security buffer between Lebanon and Israel. UNIFIL's presence notwithstanding, clashes and raids continued between the Israelis and the PLO.

In spring 1981, Israel initiated heavy aerial bombing of South Lebanon. With a lull in the attacks following the diplomatic efforts of US ambassador Philip Habib, elections in Israel, and the light resistance of the PLO due to fear of an Israeli ground invasion, Israel stepped up its bombing raids again in early July. In this renewed phase of what became known as the Two-Week War, Israel, in addition to attacking South Lebanon, bombed Lebanon's capital, Beirut. The PLO responded launching rockets and artillery into northern Israel. Hostilities continued to escalate until Habib worked out a ceasefire that both sides signed – one that would last for eleven months.

Shortly after the ceasefire agreement, Ariel Sharon got to work developing a final invasion to settle the PLO issue once and for all. Bashir Gemayel was the next up-and-coming leader of the Maronite Christians and head of the dominant Christian militia, the Phalange (founded by his father, Pierre). Gemayel had been in contact with the Israeli leadership since the end of the civil war, and it was he they were to assist in becoming president. Although, establishing a new political order in Lebanon was just one item of business in the Begin–Sharon objectives.

Split up into two plans – Small Pines and Big Pines – the smaller initiative entailed an invasion up to the Litani River in the south, and the larger, more ambitious operation involving a full-scale attack on Beirut. Knowing the Knesset would not be terribly eager to siege an Arab capital, Small Pines was emphasized in cabinet meetings.²⁹ Yet, Big Pines addressed Begin and Sharon's ultimate goals, which ran parallel with Gemayel's – the destruction of the PLO infrastructure, the expulsion of Syrian forces, and the installation of Gemayel and the Phalange. According to a standard account:

The essentials of his [Sharon's] grand strategy were never deliberated by the Cabinet – or the General Staff, for that matter – either before the war or once it was in progress. Basically, they determined that the PLO must be driven entirely out of Lebanon, and to prevent the Palestinian organizations from making a comeback Bashir Gemayel must be sworn in as the country's next president. Meanwhile, to prevent any interference from the Syrians, their army too must be evicted from Lebanon. ... Then, following the wholesale expulsion of the PLO – particularly from Beirut, where its constituent organizations had their headquarters – Israel would be able to manage its conflict with the Palestinians to its own liking.³⁰

The only order of business before execution of the operation called Peace for Galilee was to secure a reasonably sufficient amount of permission from the United States. Sharon met with Reagan's secretary of state, Alexander Haig, who stressed that only a flagrant violation on the part of the PLO would justify a substantial response of the kind Sharon had planned. In the dialogue between Sharon and Haig, "one side spoke in veiled language and allusive gestures that made it possible for the other to understand exactly what it wanted to."³¹ Sharon returned to Israel with what he felt was permission enough. Pulling the trigger was all that remained.

On June 3, an anti-Arafat splinter group by the name of Abu Nidal attempted to assassinate the Israeli ambassador, Shlomo Argov, in London. Though Israeli intelligence knew and reported who the perpetrating organization was, the incident was justification enough for Sharon. Regardless of the PLO's compliance with the July 1981 ceasefire, events had already been set in motion. The next day Israeli fighter jets hit PLO targets in Beirut and South Lebanon, prompting the PLO "violation" that would provide the desired pretext for attack. Begin's cabinet was notified of a limited 25-mile invasion, and once their approval was secured, Big Pines was set in motion.

On June 6, 80,000 Israeli ground troops entered Lebanon. Though that night the Security Council passed a resolution (509) demanding immediate Israeli withdrawal from Lebanon, Israel exhibited the same defiance as the IDF had when moving past the UNIFIL security zone at the border. The ground divisions moved through South Lebanon with tanks, artillery and air support, and in the matter of a few days accomplished (and surpassed) the goals of Little Pines. In the first week thousands of Palestinians and Lebanese had been killed, the vast majority civilians.³² By the end of the first week Israel had overwhelmed the hesitant Syrian troops, and with American pressure, entered into a ceasefire with Syria; the PLO offered to join the agreement but was dismissed. With the Palestinians displaced in the south and Syria out of the picture, Lebanon's capital lay wide open. The IDF then sealed off and shelled West Beirut for the next two months.

By the beginning of August, Arafat's only option was withdrawal, which was simultaneously being called for by the Israelis. The United States sent Philip Habib to arrange a final settlement, and by August 11 a plan was forged and agreed upon by all parties. An international peacekeeping force was deployed – French, Italian, and US troops – to ensure safe passage of the PLO out of Beirut as well as protection for remaining non-combatant Palestinians in the refugee camps. Sharon, who did not share the cabinet's agreement with the Habib plan, gave the order for a renewed attack on Beirut, which featured a solid day of saturation bombing and causing an estimated 300 dead.³³ The Americans and the Israeli cabinet were outraged with Sharon, the latter suspending his power to order attacks. By September 1 the last of the PLO left Beirut via boat with the international force pulling out over the next two weeks.

Bashir Gemayel was elected president on August 23. In a moment typical of international affairs, Gemayel, upon being reminded by Begin and Sharon of the discussed peace treaty between the two countries (as well as the president-elect's indebtedness) the Maronite leader was not forthcoming. His newfound power had expanded his horizons. Nevertheless, Sharon and Gemayel shared the same concern, that of the remaining Palestinians, an element both men wanted to see rooted out and expelled from Lebanon.³⁴ Things changed course (or at least timing) when a bomb set off by a Syrian extremist killed Gemayel while he was delivering a lecture in East Beirut (September 14). Sharon immediately sent IDF forces into West Beirut to secure the two Palestinian refugee camps of Sabra and Shatila. He asserted that approximately 2,000 terrorists remained in the area, and once the area was secured by the IDF, 150 Phalangists were transported to the camps. The Phalangists were brimming with hatred for the opposition, and the Israeli chief of staff notified Sharon that, "They're thirsting for revenge and there could be torrents of blood."³⁵ Sharon dismissed the warning. The fighters entered Sabra and Shatila on the evening of September 16 and emerged the morning of September 19. When it was all over the massacre left behind between 800 and 2,000 dead men, women, and children, all of whom had been unarmed civilians.³⁶ Reports surfaced of accounts of rape, serial execution, and mutilation; the bodies of children and women littered the camps. Indeed, the numbers were strategically curious: Sending in 150 Phalangists to do battle with 2,000 armed PLO remnants started to raise questions, however late.³⁷

After the Sabra–Shatila incident the multinational forces, who had originally been there to protect non-combatants, returned to Beirut. The American military presence along with the Reagan administration’s negotiations with, and apparent support of, the ruling Maronites brought the United States into direct involvement. Non-Christian militias began attacking US Marines. The American embassy was bombed with a truckload of explosives in April 1983, killing 60. After US naval bombardments of opposition targets, another truck bomb killed 241 US service personnel at a Marine barracks outside Beirut. Despite Reagan’s desire to stay and fight terrorism and prevent what he perceived as a Soviet threat, the United States pulled out of Lebanon in February 1984.³⁸ Israel would withdraw from South Lebanon, barring a strip of land at the southern border, in June 1985. The civil war in Lebanon continued on and would do so into the early 1990s. Israel’s goal of extinguishing Palestinian nationalism did not achieve the desired effect. In fact, it achieved the exact opposite.

POST-LEBANON DIPLOMACY

The bloodshed and destruction wrought in Lebanon in the early 1980s was punctuated by diplomatic initiatives. In the space of two weeks, autumn 1982 saw three different peace proposals placed on the table. President Reagan’s administration created the Reagan Plan (September 1), calling for Palestinian autonomy and federation of the West Bank and Gaza with Jordan, but no statehood; a freeze on construction of Israeli settlements in the occupied territories; Israeli withdrawal in return for Arab peace; and a determination of the status of Jerusalem through negotiations. Reagan also sent a separate note to Begin promising that no settlements would be dismantled. Israel rejected the plan outright while Arafat and King Hussein remained open to the possibilities.

One week later, at an Arab summit in Fez, Morocco, the Fez Plan was produced.³⁹ This plan called for: full Israeli withdrawal (in accordance with Arab interpretation of UN 242); a Palestinian state under the PLO; compensation for refugees; peace and security for regional states; and the dismantling of Israeli settlements in Israel. And a week after that the Soviet Union followed up the Fez Plan with the Brezhnev Plan, named after Russia’s prime minister. The Russians, who supported the Fez Plan while judging the Reagan Plan a “farce,”⁴⁰ echoed what was outlined at the Arab summit, except the Soviet plan referred to Israel by name; the Fez Plan makes only implicit mention. In addition to the Reagan Plan, Israel rejected the subsequent two programs. This inflexibility over the occupied territories would survive another change of leadership.

In addition to growing protests over the war in Lebanon, the issue of lost Israeli lives became a foreground issue, which in turn increased protests. Of the 600 IDF personnel who died in the war, roughly half had died in the sustained occupation after the PLO had been evacuated.⁴¹

Coming on top of a list of failed achievements – no treaty with Lebanon, heightened Palestinian nationalism – Menachem Begin resigned from his premiership early and retired into obscurity (August 1983). The new prime minister, Yitzhak Shamir, would only hold the post exclusively for a year, until elections (July 1984) where the two main political parties, Likud and Labor, ended up splitting the vote, indicative of a polarized public. The two parties would combine to form a coalition government, the leaders of which would each spend two years as prime minister: Shamir for Likud, and Shimon Peres for Labor.

After the PLO left Beirut, Arafat set up a new headquarters (the third) in Tunisia's capital city of Tunis. He also faced deep divisions within sections of the PLO, especially his own branch, Fatah. This internal dissent was a by-product of the defeat under the Israeli invasion, the Sabra–Shatila massacre, and Arafat's continued diplomatic efforts along with his moderate involvement with the various peace plans – Reagan, Fez, and Brezhnev. Though condemned by Israel as a terrorist enemy of the Jewish state, certain factions of Arafat's organization condemned him with equal ferocity for being a diplomatic moderate with pro-Western leanings. In spring 1983, fighting broke out in Syria-controlled northern Lebanon between Arafat loyalists and Fatah rebels with the help of Syrian forces. Arafat returned to Lebanon in September to resolve the matter, hoping to bring political and international pressure on the opposition and Syria. By November the loyalists had suffered significant setbacks, and by December a ceasefire was declared with Saudi Arabia forging an agreement with Syria. Arafat, for a second time, was forced out of Lebanon.

However, the PLO chairman would continue along his diplomatic path, working out a joint agreement with Jordan that was announced in February 1985. The items of the agreement included total Israeli withdrawal, Palestinian self-determination in the context of the “confederated Arab States of Jordan and Palestine,” and negotiations conducted by an international conference involving the UN Security Council.⁴² Israel and the United States rejected the communiqué, both refusing to conduct negotiations with the PLO, as well as refusing to work within an international conference.

The diplomatic process was interrupted when on September 25, 1985, three Israeli tourists were murdered in Cyprus by PLO extremists.⁴³ In response, Israel bombed the PLO headquarters in Tunis on October 1. A cycle of violence naturally ensued. Among other acts of terrorism, extremist Palestinians, a week after the attack on Tunis, hijacked an Italian cruise ship, the Achille Lauro, on which a disabled Jewish-American man was murdered and cast overboard. This most recent diplomatic sequence dissolved like its predecessors.

Even so, if one element in the total Palestinian–Arab–Israeli conflict remained uninterrupted, it was the ever-increasing tension in the West Bank and Gaza, and the popular support in those territories for the PLO, its chairman, and statehood.

The First Intifada and the Peace Process

Note: Our attention now returns to the Palestine–Israel conflict. As the Arab–Israeli conflict continued to play out like a perpetual ballet of violence, failed diplomacy, and rejection, things in the occupied territories of the West Bank and Gaza were undergoing steady transformation. Where we start out in this chapter, in the latter half of the 1980s, the people born during the Six-Day War were now turning 20. A whole new generation had grown up only knowing Israeli control of what remained of Palestine. For Palestinian youth this meant growing up under harsh military occupation, and for the young Israeli generation it meant never knowing the occupied territories to belong to anyone else. What happened next placed the West Bank and Gaza at center stage in the evolving conflict, to the surprise of Israel, the Arab world, the international community, and even the PLO.

THE INTIFADA (1987–91)

On December 8, 1987, an Israeli Defense Forces vehicle crashed into a truck in Gaza carrying Palestinian laborers home from work. In the accident four were killed, along with seven wounded. Rumors spread alleging that the accident was an act of vengeance for an Israeli who had been stabbed to death the previous week. The turnout for the funerals of the deceased workers numbered in the thousands and immediately evolved into angry protest. The IDF, viewing the disturbance as a routine demonstration, moved to disperse the crowd with tear gas and live ammunition, killing 20-year-old Hatem al-Sisi, who became the first martyr of the uprising. Israeli occupation troops at the scene met with an atypical level of resistance among the Palestinians. What had officially begun was the Intifada, an Arabic term meaning “shaking off.”

As is common with major turmoil – political as well as personal – what sets off the explosion is usually remarkably small. That a fatal traffic accident could ignite the anger and hatred of over 1.5 million people indicates the level of cumulative and collective frustration that existed in the occupied territories. Since the 1967 war Palestinians had chafed under occupation, with protests and resistance being a daily affair. Life in the territories featured “stone throwing, Molotov cocktails, strikes, demonstrations, [and] refusal to pay taxes,” while enduring “large-scale arrests, imprisonment without trial, deportations, punitive destruction of homes and property, beating, and the use of tear gas and live ammunition against crowds.”¹ From 1968 to 1975 the IDF counted 350 incidents of rebellion a year, or about one a day. From the mid-1970s to the early 1980s the number doubled, soon reaching 3,000 incidents a year, roughly eight a day. In the first six months of the Intifada, however, 42,355 incidents were recorded.²

The ever increasing urge to rebel that eventually led to the Intifada was in direct response to not only the occupation, but also a sense of political isolation. The Arab world, which had done little or nothing in the way of aiding the Palestinians, left those in the territories with a sense of abandonment; the PLO's ultimate inability to make serious headway regarding Palestinian sovereignty and statehood was also another major factor. Though Palestinians still backed the PLO as the symbol of national unity, West Bankers and Gazans alike began to see the necessity of taking matters into their own hands: "We support the PLO because we are the PLO."³

The conditions in the occupied territories were the primary concern and cause of Palestinian unrest. Though the 1970s saw an increase in wages and living standards, especially in the West Bank when compared to the times of Jordanian rule, the 1980s underwent a sharp economic decline in Israel. The drop in value of the shekel (Israeli monetary unit), to which the Palestinian economy is tethered, directly affected the territories. Nevertheless, economic fluctuations merely offered varying degrees of distraction; life under occupation, as the constant and growing number of incidents of unrest indicated, was increasingly intolerable.

As mentioned in the previous chapter, settlement activity expanded significantly. With the rise to power of Menachem Begin and his Likud party in 1977 came a focused and aggressive effort to colonize as much of the West Bank and Gaza as possible. The average annual number of settlers moving to the occupied territories from 1967 to 1977 was 770, whereas the average in the period of 1978–87 leapt to 5,690 annually.⁴ Moreover, with settlement obviously came requisition of land and resources. From the Six-Day War to the Intifada – the first 20 years of occupation – Israel had requisitioned half of the West Bank and a third of Gaza.⁵ The burgeoning numbers of Israeli settlers in the West Bank alone – 20,000 in 1982 to 60,000 in 1986 – amid the native population of 800,000 created a sense of emergency and fear.⁶ Israel's drive into that territory ultimately achieved virtual annexation, and the loss of land to an encroaching colonial population rested on top of day-to-day conditions unbearable to the Palestinians.

Permanent fixtures of life under occupation included checkpoints, searches, curfews, and school closures. In response came anti-occupation methods such as strikes, demonstrations, boycotts, and clashes. What ensued was an upward spiral: the pressure of the IDF's rule over the territories inspired protest, which in turn intensified IDF pressure. While the levels of oppression and resistance increased, the older generations, too, began to move toward a less passive course of action. The concept of sumud, or steadfastness, had generally been the approach to life under occupation. In a sustained act of passive resistance the Palestinians in the territories remained on the land and refused to budge, all the while creating their own organizations and services to make life easier. But the people of the territories started to resist more actively, taking matters of leadership into their own hands, creating what one political scientist referred to as the "new sumud."⁷ Still and all, when things reached a climax in December 1987, it was the younger generation who commenced and carried out the Intifada.

For young Palestinians, the concept of sumud, old or new, was lost on them. The older generations had known better times and were more or less willing to suffer through and wait it out, hoping for the return of some kind of normalcy. The young, on the other hand, grew up angry and less tolerant of the constant searches, curfews, and periodic shutting down of their schools. Kids ranging in age from seven through the teenage years organized, divided up responsibilities, tied khaffiyas (checkered headscarves) around their heads like masks, and met head-on with the IDF's occupation troops. Roads were barricaded, tires set on fire, and stones and iron bars were hurled. The leaders of the revolt were in their late teens and early twenties, delegating authority down through the ranks that were composed by age. While the smaller children lit fires and set up roadblocks, the older youth handled direct confrontation and organizational duties. The spontaneous grassroots uprising quickly evolved into a unified front.

While the “children of the stones” carried on in the streets, Palestinian society followed suit.⁸ Leaflets were distributed weekly with instructions to maintain organization. Strikes, boycotts on Israeli goods, food distribution to communities locked in by curfew, and daycare for children were all concerns that were attended to by the various grassroots committees. Women’s groups, labor unions, professional associations, and the average citizen were all now involved in a revolution. “Family gardens became a symbol of resistance to Israeli authorities,” Charles D. Smith notes, “who at times arrested Arabs for growing their own food, as happened in the village of Bayt Sahur.”⁹ The lines of society began to dissipate in the heat of organization. According to Israeli sociologist Baruch Kimmerling and international studies scholar Joel S. Migdal in their history of the Palestinian people, the Intifada brought together diverse groups of Palestinians—gender, class—and encouraged “a political levelling of the society.”¹⁰

The different groups and task-forces eventually coalesced into a larger framework. The Unified National Leadership of the Uprising (UNLU) formed an underground coordinating hub that issued directives, printed leaflets, and maintained the political trajectory of the Intifada: statehood. With the PLO on the sidelines in Tunis, a partnership formed between the two groups, though the primacy of the exiled leadership was willfully recognized. Also beginning to sprout up were Muslim organizations, signaling an Islamic revival.

The Egypt-based Muslim Brotherhood was an organization dedicated more to religious education and less to politics and revolution. However, groups that splintered off the Brotherhood adopted militant philosophies during the Intifada. One group was Islamic Jihad, which formed in Gaza over the course of the first half of the 1980s and remained a smaller movement. From the Brotherhood also emerged, in January 1988, a new group called Hamas (Islamic Resistance Movement).¹¹ Unlike the UNLU–PLO connection, which desired a secular state in the West Bank and Gaza brought about by civil resistance, the Muslim organizations sought an Islamic state in all of former Palestine, to be achieved by armed and violent means. From the fundamentalist perspective, jihad, or holy war, was the only mechanism by which a religious state could be wrested from the Zionists. Hamas gained significant support, especially in Gaza, and became the second largest organized effort in the territories next to the UNLU. Yet, for most of the Intifada Hamas avoided confrontation with the PLO. Though ideologically divergent from the secular leadership, it aimed to cooperate with the UNLU–PLO structure and maintain the integrity of the Intifada. The friction of difference would, however, worsen over time.

At its outset, Hamas organized the building of schools, mosques, and clinics, in addition to honing its political agenda. Israel, viewing the religious groups as an alternative to the PLO, and possibly a competitor, supported Hamas’s endeavors along with providing them financial assistance.¹² This changed once the group’s militant intentions were brought to light in its official charter (August 1988). The document, anti-Semitic and anti-Zionist in nature, made clear the organization’s interpretation of the struggle as a religious one: “[Hamas] strives to raise the banner of Allah over every inch of Palestine ... There is no solution for the Palestinian question except through Jihad.”¹³

But irrespective of the various emerging factions and organizations, secular and religious, the front line of the Intifada was the effort in the street: kids throwing stones and confronting well-armed and trained troops.

Israeli policies in the West Bank and Gaza went from harsh and restrictive to worse with the advent of the Intifada. What became known as an “iron fist” policy was a severe procedural response to the threat posed by organized rebellion among the indigenous Arabs. Though the IDF’s stated method of “might, power, and beatings” was presented as a less severe policy – made in response to strong domestic and international criticism of military brutality – the degree of violent suppression persisted.¹⁴ Pre-Intifada measures now seemed mild compared to Israel’s heightened reaction to the uprising. Human rights organizations issued reports and made cases at the United Nations regarding gross violations of international law. In late 1988 the UN General Assembly passed a resolution (43/21) condemning Israel’s “killing and wounding of defenceless Palestinian civilians, the beating and breaking of bones, the deportation of Palestinian civilians, the imposition of restrictive economic measures, the demolition of houses, collective punishment and detentions, as well as denial of access to the media.”¹⁵ The only two nations to vote against the resolution were the United States and Israel. Despite the international consensus, the IDF’s tactics continued. In the case of house demolition, by mid-1990 300 homes had been razed.¹⁶ The act of leveling homes was usually carried out in response to stone throwing, and based on the suspicion that the perpetrator lived there.

By 1991 the Intifada began to lose momentum, though skirmishes and uprisings of lesser intensity continued into 1993. By the end of 1992 over 100 Israelis (civilian and non-civilian) had died. At the end of 1993, over 1,000 Palestinians were dead, roughly 20 percent of whom were under 16 years of age; the wounded numbered in the tens of thousands.¹⁷ Four years of resistance and protest had not only withstood severe suppression but further unified the Palestinians. But the focus of the Intifada was slowly replaced with an increased infighting among them in cases of suspected traitors. Militant religious fundamentalism was also on the rise in the territories, and brought with it acts of armed terrorism instead of stone throwing. As for the “external” leadership (the PLO in Tunis), their eyes turned to the international arena with the intent of securing a settlement through politics and diplomacy, instead of rebellion and confrontation. Though the Intifada had been sustained, nothing decisive came of it. The PLO had to parlay what had been achieved, namely, world attention and a new emphasis on the issue of Palestinian statehood, into a further, more concrete political achievement.

Politics and Diplomacy during the Intifada

A meeting of the PLO’s parliamentary body, the Palestinian National Council (PNC), was held in Algiers in November 1988. At the meeting, Chairman Yasser Arafat announced the state of Palestine in a formal declaration of independence.¹⁸ Along with proclaiming sovereignty and a two-state solution, the PNC issued a resolution calling for an international peace conference, one based on Resolutions 242 and 338, and addressing “the issue of the Middle East and its core, the question of Palestine.”¹⁹ Though the PLO’s announcement of statehood drew significant acceptance, with over 100 countries recognizing the declaration, Washington was less enthused, claiming the Palestinian leadership was involved in terrorism – regardless of the State Department's findings to the contrary.

Nonetheless, the Americans refused the chairman a travel visa to speak in New York before the forthcoming UN meeting. The General Assembly instead moved the session to Geneva, Switzerland, where Arafat spoke in December. After two speeches emphatically renouncing terrorism and clarifying his peace proposal in a manner more acceptable to the United States, the White House agreed to enter into dialogue with the PLO. With the Palestinians meeting American demands and the proceeding diplomatic contact, Israel began to feel pressured into producing a response.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir (1986–92) proposed in May 1989 that elections be held in “Judea, Samaria and Gaza.” Reminiscent of the Camp David Accords in 1978, the territories would be allowed “self-rule” during an interim period while “permanent solution” decisions were made. But the Shamir Plan rejected negotiations with the PLO and opposed “the establishment of an additional Palestinian state in the Gaza district and in the area between Israel and Jordan [the West Bank].”²⁰ The PLO rejected the plan, the United States looked on it with favor, the Arabs in general viewed it as a hoax and a ploy to stall the matter, and Shamir's own party members felt he was giving away too much. Ultimately the initiative went nowhere and died shortly after it was issued. Further proposals made by the White House and Cairo in autumn 1989 met with Israeli rejection, bringing the phase of diplomacy to a standstill.

In spring 1990 a small faction within the PLO made an unsuccessful attack on the coast of Tel Aviv. The United States demanded condemnation of the act and discipline of the perpetrators, but Arafat made only a general and limited response emphasizing his lack of involvement in the affair. As a result, the White House discontinued its exchange with the PLO. With a renewed sense of abandonment, and frustration with the growing lack of direction of the Intifada, the Palestinians looked in the direction of Iraq and its leader, Saddam Hussein.

THE GULF CRISIS (1990–91)

From 1980 to 1988, Iraq and Iran were locked in a long and vicious war, finally producing nothing more than a stalemate and massive casualties on both sides. While still in possession of the fourth-largest military in the world, Baghdad was in economic straits. It was in debt to Kuwait for financial support during the war, all the while accusing the tiny oil-rich monarchy of depressing oil prices (by exceeding production quotas) and stealing from an oil field that straddled the border between the two countries. Kuwait's response to Hussein's demands for compensation and debt relief was total refusal, which infuriated the Iraqi dictator. On August 2, 1990, Baghdad poured 100,000 troops over the border and, literally overnight, surrounded Kuwait City, eventually annexing the entire country. The Security Council passed Resolution 678, giving Hussein an evacuation deadline (January 15) and authorizing “all means necessary” in the event of failure to comply. A US-led coalition commenced Operation Desert Storm on January 16, 1991. In five weeks Iraq was expelled from Kuwait, and Baghdad lay in ruins. Though we cannot go into a thorough review of the Gulf War here, it should be noted that during the operation Iraq launched 39 Scud missiles (ground-to-ground) into Israel's largest city, Tel Aviv. Though the physical damage was severe, the attacks accounted for only a couple of fatalities. At White House request, Israel made no response to Iraq's aggression.

Over the course of the conflict in the Persian Gulf the PLO and the Palestinians looked to Hussein as a source of support. The rationale was this: As the Intifada dwindled and lost its bearings, the Palestinians were frustrated by lack of progress, lack of PLO achievement, lack of Arab-world support, and lack of the world community's application of international law (UN 242). Hussein, with his fiery anti-Western rhetoric and pro-Palestinian sentiments, gave the appearance of hope to those in the occupied territories. Perhaps with Iraq's powerful army a revolution might be raised within the Arab world, and present a military solution to Israeli occupation. The PLO pledged support for Hussein, and though Arafat initially presented a peace plan for Iraqi withdrawal from Kuwait, he too gave Saddam his blessing. The PLO-Palestinian backing of Baghdad would prove both fruitless and ill chosen: (1) opinion of Palestine, inside the Middle East and out, turned negative; (2) the oil-rich Gulf states, especially Saudi Arabia, which served as a source of financial assistance for the West Bank and Gaza, were outraged and withdrew aid; and (3) Israel's view of, and refusal to negotiate with, the PLO was only further cemented. Nevertheless, by the end of the Gulf War the United States was left looking at the Arab-Israeli conflict. Moreover, the Soviet Union collapsed over the course of 1991, sounding the death knell for the Cold War. And with the removal of the USSR as a factor in Middle East politics, the list of external controls in the region – Ottoman, European, and superpower – was increased by one, and one that remains today: American.

THE PEACE PROCESS: MADRID AND OSLO I & II

In January 1989, George H. W. Bush entered the White House. It was under this administration in 1991 that Washington found itself in this new and unique position regarding the Middle East: (1) it was the sole power player in the region; (2) it had assembled a list of Arab countries that were willing to cooperate, and did so in the American-led coalition in the Gulf War; (3) the former Soviet clients, such as Syria, Iraq, and Libya, were now without a backer; and (4) the idea of Israel as a US strategic asset was now under reconsideration, especially given its basic lack of tactical value against Iraq. On top of all this, immediate American response to Kuwait's occupation began to confound some as to why Washington would not tolerate one occupation (Iraq in Kuwait), but tolerated another (Israel in Palestine). President Bush and his secretary of state, James Baker, were looking for a political victory to add to their military result in Iraq. They also saw an open opportunity to get Israel and the Arab world around the negotiating table in an attempt to smooth out the Arab-Israeli issue and establish stable American control of the Middle East. That table was located in Madrid, Spain.

The Madrid Conference (1991–93)

Bush and Baker managed to gather together into the same room Egypt, Israel, Lebanon, Syria, and a joint Jordanian-Palestinian delegation. When they assembled on October 30, 1991, in the Royal Palace in Madrid, each country was willing by and large to engage in negotiations. The meetings were co-chaired directly by the Bush-Baker team as well as Mikhail Gorbachev, the last leader of the USSR. (Bear in mind the Soviet Union was very soon to become the Russian Federation – still called Russia – and regardless of the projected image of partnership, Gorbachev was there as a hopeful recipient of American aid just as much as anybody else.)

Serving as a basis for the conference were UN Resolutions 242 and 338, along with the concept of land-for-peace. As you can probably predict by now, Israel's position was "autonomy" for the Palestinians as well as continued settlement construction, whereas the Palestinians were looking for statehood. Their respective commitments were fixed, as they had been for decades, and this would not change throughout the talks.

Prime Minister Shamir headed Israel's delegation. But demands made by Israel, and followed by the United States, kept the PLO from being admitted or involved in the Madrid Conference. What was assembled instead was a small group of intellectuals from the occupied territories to represent the Palestinian leadership. Among them were Haidar Abdul Shafi, a physician from Gaza; Hanan Ashrawi, a professor of English literature educated in the United States; and Faisal al-Husseini, a political activist and leader of the Intifada. During the conference's opening addresses, Shafi delivered the speech for the Palestinian delegation, an eloquent address that still draws comments by scholars. Historian Avi Shlaim humorously notes: "As Abdul Shafi delivered his speech, Israel's stony-faced prime minister passed a note to a colleague. A joke going around the conference hall was that the note read, 'We made a big mistake. We should have let the PLO come.'"²¹

Multilateral and bilateral talks went on through 1992 and into the first half of 1993, taking place in a number of cities, including Washington DC. The panels frequently bogged down, as American guidance was minimal and distant at best. Leaving the sharply divided delegations to sort it out for themselves created a hopeless situation. In 1992, elections in Israel produced the fall of the Shamir government and Yitzhak Rabin's rise to the seat of prime minister. On the American side, Bush fell in defeat to William Jefferson Clinton, who entered the White House in January 1993. Though Rabin presented himself as being more resilient and willing to negotiate than Yitzhak Shamir, his cabinet stayed the established course. Bill Clinton's administration, however, was far more supportive of Israel than the Bush administration. In addition to the lack of American involvement in the Madrid panel discussions under Bush-Baker, Clinton and Secretary of State Warren Christopher's attentiveness to Israel meant certain breakdown for the talks. (Regardless of Clinton's increased interest in Israel, aid for Israel, even through Bush's term, stayed high and constant at $3 billion a year, and remains at that level today.²²)

The symbolic significance of the Madrid Conference far outweighed its accomplishments, which were thin indeed. However, a precedent had been set by these countries gathering face-to-face; it was also the first time Israel and the Palestinians met in open dialogue. As Madrid was withering from Bush-Baker's neglect and Clinton-Christopher's decided position, another set of secret talks were going on in Oslo, Norway.

The Oslo Accord (September 1993)

Undisclosed meetings had begun in January 1993 between the Israelis and the PLO at the invitation of the Norwegian government. These clandestine ("back channel") discussions were conducted over an eight-month period, and produced what became known as the Oslo Accord. Aside from the two parties involved, the rest of the world knew nothing about the negotiations being hosted by the Norwegians; even the American leadership, which knew about them, was not familiar with their substance. In late summer 1993, the accord was announced in Oslo, and on September 13 was signed on the White House lawn with Bill Clinton as master of ceremonies – irrespective of total lack of American involvement. Featuring a somewhat awkward handshake between Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin and Chairman Yasser Arafat, a breakthrough of major historic significance had been achieved. The image of the Rabin–Arafat handshake, with Clinton as overseer, would become an icon of the twentieth century.

It is important to remember that the Oslo Accord is not a peace treaty or a final settlement of any kind – far from it. It is an agenda or interim agreement to negotiate such things. The accord is composed of two parts: The first is mutual recognition of the other, which came in the form of letters that were exchanged by the two leaders. The second component is the Declaration of Principles (DOP), spelling out initial responsibilities (which were few), and a timetable for negotiating various outstanding issues (which were many). The agenda calls for: Israeli withdrawal from Gaza and the “Jericho area” (a town in the West Bank); establishment of a Palestinian police force for internal security affairs; elections for a “Palestinian Interim Self-Government Authority” or Palestinian Council; and transfer of authority to the Palestinians regarding “education and culture, health, social welfare, direct taxation, and tourism.”²³ Permanent status negotiations would begin in two years and a final settlement achieved within five years. This is about as detailed as the document gets. Everything else is left up to the established timelines and agendas, and the mutual promise to see things through. Avi Shlaim comments:

The shape of the permanent settlement is not specified in the DOP but is left to negotiations between the two parties during the second stage. The DOP is completely silent on vital issues such as the right of return of the 1948 refugees, the borders of the Palestinian entity, the future of the Jewish settlements in the West Bank and Gaza, and the status of Jerusalem. The reason for this silence is not hard to understand: if these issues had been addressed, there would have been no accord.²⁴

Oslo marked a momentous occasion where Israel and the PLO had managed not only to engage one another directly, but also produce a framework that both agreed upon; and all this accomplished without external influence or guidance. Yet, much was left undone. The extremely general and ambiguous language of the accord allowed both parties to bestow upon it whatever interpretation suited their actual desires and/or needs. The PLO saw a path toward statehood, and Israel viewed it as retention of the territories without the burden of having to administer them. Both Arafat and Rabin came under harsh condemnation for what each leader’s detractors viewed as a sacrifice of core philosophy. For the Israelis this meant the goal of Greater Israel from the Jordan River to the Mediterranean Sea. For the Palestinians it was statehood inside the pre-1967 Green Line. Charles D. Smith notes:

From a Palestinian rejectionist viewpoint, Arafat had done what they had always feared, he recognized Israel’s existence without gaining mutual acknowledgment of a Palestinian right to self-determination. Conversely, from an Israeli rejectionist standpoint, the very fact that the existence of a Palestinian people, let alone the PLO, had been acknowledged was anathema and the prelude to a Palestinian state in areas they were determined to retain for Israel.²⁵

Regardless of the criticism, popular sentiment on both sides was generally favorable to the accord. Polls by Gallup, CNN, and French Television revealed 65 percent approval ratings among both Israelis and Palestinians.²⁶

In July 1994, Arafat returned from exile and took up residence in Gaza, where he established a police force and the Palestinian Council. Israel began its withdrawal from the Jericho area and Gaza. In December, Arafat, Rabin, and Israeli foreign minister Shimon Peres all received Nobel Peace Prizes.

Oslo II (September 1995)

On September 24, 1995, at the Egyptian Red Sea resort of Taba, the Interim Agreement established in the Oslo Accord's DOP (Article VII) was negotiated and signed. Four days later a ceremony at the White House with Rabin, Peres, and Arafat made official what became known as Oslo II, or the Taba Accord (also known as the "Second Phase," or the "Interim Agreement"). For our purposes here we will use "Oslo II" to distinguish the Taba Accord from the original Oslo Accord. Just know that Oslo II was one of the "things to do" in Oslo I.

The nucleus of the Oslo II Accord – all 300-plus pages of it – is the establishment of areas of control in the West Bank for the Palestinians and the Israelis. There are three areas, A, B, and C, designating the civil and administrative spheres of Palestinian jurisdiction:

- Area A: 3 percent of the West Bank; under Palestinian control; and containing the six main cities of Bethlehem, Jenin, Nablus, Qalqilya, Ramallah, and Tulkarm. (Jericho is included, but was already under Palestinian control, and Hebron was to be handled separately and later, which we will discuss.)
- Area B: 24 percent of the West Bank; under joint Palestinian–Israeli control; and containing 450 small towns and villages.
- Area C: 73 percent of the West Bank; under Israeli control (pending "permanent status negotiations"); and containing Jewish settlements, Jerusalem, military bases, state lands, and external borders.

Again, vague language allowed for broad interpretation. Obviously, the sticking point between the two parties was going to be Area C, the lion's share of the West Bank. The actual wording in the accord is as follows:

"Area C" means areas of the West Bank outside Areas A and B, which, except for the issues that will be negotiated in the permanent status negotiations, will be gradually transferred to Palestinian jurisdiction in accordance with this agreement.²⁷ [Emphasis added]

Arafat maintained that most of Area C was soon to be Palestinian. Israel's view was different, as summarized by historians Ian J. Bickerton and Carla L. Klausner: "In attempting to reassure Israelis, Foreign Minister Peres noted that under the accord, Israel would maintain control of 73 percent of the land, 80 percent of the water, and 97 percent of the security arrangements – a statement that only intensified Palestinian anxiety."²⁸ Regardless of how the two perspectives differed, the situation caused concern on both sides, not the least of which came from religious extremists.

Map adapted from PASSIA, 2002

Hamas was livid that Arafat had negotiated away Palestinian land, while various Jewish settler groups and fundamentalist rabbis saw Oslo II as a desecration of biblical Israel. Condemnation of Rabin also came from the Knesset itself, including members of the Likud party. Acts of terrorism were perpetrated from both sides in expression of this anger. But Arabs killing Jews and Jews killing Arabs were not the only acts of violence to punctuate this period. On November 4, 1995, after attending a peace rally in Tel Aviv, Yitzhak Rabin was assassinated by a young Jewish law student. Shooting the prime minister twice in the back, a religious zealot named Yigal Amir claimed divine guidance in his act to, as he viewed it, save Israel and Jewish lives from Rabin's concession of land to the Palestinians. Shimon Peres assumed the position of prime minister and continued with the developments of Oslo II. But a new era was descending upon Israel and the occupied territories, where the ambiguities of the Oslo Accords, occupation, and terrorism would become the status quo.

AFTER OSLO (1996–99)

After the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin, Prime Minister Shimon Peres took to implementing the terms of Oslo II, withdrawing from six Area A cities and 400 Area B villages. On the Palestinian side, elections took place in January 1996 for what became the Palestinian Authority (PA). PLO leader Yasser Arafat was elected president, taking 88 percent of the vote with high voter turnout in Gaza and the West Bank; turnout in occupied East Jerusalem was much lower owing to Israeli security measures and intimidation.²⁹ In addition to the presidency, an 88-seat legislature was established, making the PA complete. The image of a Palestinian state was taking shape.

Formality and procedure aside, popular sentiment in the territories went from caution to suspicion as the various zoning set up under Oslo II was put into effect. Freedom of passage between towns and villages was replaced with checkpoints and territorial closures. Despite a measure of autonomy, it quickly became apparent that less freedom was offered under the Oslo agreements than the previous form of occupation. A and B domains were reduced to virtual islands surrounded by Israeli control of who went in and out. In addition to checkpoints and roadblocks, Jewish settlements were connected to one another via bypass roads allowing settlers free mobility throughout the territories, between one settlement and another and Israel proper. Aside from hemming in the Palestinian areas, the construction of such roads necessitated the use of Area C land. What some members of the Palestinian negotiating team had warned Arafat about – that Oslo was in fact a consolidation of Israel's control over the territories – was becoming a reality.³⁰

Beyond the nature of Oslo, and what it boded for the future, things were moving along somewhat smoothly. That said, the calm was soon disturbed by Peres's early January 1996 order for the assassination of Yahya Ayyash ("the Engineer"), an expert bomb-maker for Hamas. Though there had been no terrorist acts since August 1995, Ayyash's cellphone exploded in his ear later that month. This came on the heels of Israel's October 1995 assassination of a prominent leader of Islamic Jihad. In response, from late February to early March 1996, a wave of suicide bombings was unleashed against Israel. Anti-Israeli violence also erupted in the Israeli-occupied “security zone” in South Lebanon, created at the end of the invasion in 1982 – and not withdrawn from until 2000.

Another extremist organization to emerge in the 1980s (p. 145) was Hizballah, or the Party of God. Begun by Shiite clerics in Lebanon, Hizballah’s goal was to drive Israel from the security zone. In the weeks following the Hamas suicide bombings, Hizballah stepped up attacks against the IDF in southern Lebanon, including a suicide bombing. The Lebanese guerrilla assaults then escalated to the firing of Katyusha rockets into Israel proper, causing injuries but no deaths. Peres, in response, launched Operation Grapes of Wrath. Over April 11–27, Israel sent F-16 fighter jets and helicopter gunships to bomb Hizballah centers along with Lebanese infrastructure such as roads and power stations. The bombing reached as far as Beirut. Hizballah counterattacked, raining hundreds of Katyusha rockets down on northern Israel. During the invasion over 400,000 Lebanese fled their homes, with casualties reaching 200 dead and hundreds wounded.³¹ On April 27, a US-brokered agreement was signed between Lebanon and Israel, bringing the violence to a close. Not only had the disproportionate IDF response elicited international criticism and condemnation from friend and foe alike, Shimon Peres inspired little domestic confidence in his actions throughout spring 1996. Israeli elections in May saw the Likud party regain power with the thin (1 percent) victory of Benjamin Netanyahu.

The new prime minister began his tenure by securing in place the status quo. Closure of the territories after the spring Hamas attacks remained enforced, and no further progress or movement was initiated regarding Oslo. The “Basic Guidelines” issued by the new government made no mention of the accord, while emphasizing the settlement program:

Settlement in the Negev, the Galilee, the Golan Heights, the Jordan Valley, and in Judea, Samaria [West Bank] and Gaza is of national importance, to Israel’s defense and an expression of Zionist fulfillment. The Government will alter the settlement policy, act to consolidate and develop the settlement enterprise in these areas, and allocate the resources necessary for this.³²

On top of ending the four-year freeze on settlements and placing the peace process on hold, Netanyahu struck a provocative pose in East Jerusalem.

On September 24, Netanyahu ordered the opening of a second entrance to the Hasmonean Tunnel, an archaeological site that runs along the western perimeter of the Temple Mount. Though intended for tourists, previous prime ministers had delayed opening the tunnel in recognition of the potential upheaval it might ignite. Fearful that Israel was undermining the Al-Aqsa Mosque and the Dome of the Rock, and with encouragement from Arafat, Palestinians poured out in protest. Regardless of the tunnel posing no actual threat of damage to the Muslim holy sites, the act accomplished what many knew it would. Demonstrations and stone throwing met with IDF rubber bullets, and eventually gunfire exchanged between both sides; the Hasmonean Tunnel incident would claim the lives of 60–80 Palestinians and 15 IDF troops.³³ As the situation degenerated into the IDF deploying tanks and helicopter gunships in the territories, President Clinton called Arafat and Netanyahu to Washington where the hostilities were put to rest and Oslo matters resumed.

The Hebron Agreement (1997)

Israel and the Palestinian Authority signed an accord (January 15, 1997) addressing the outstanding matters tabled in Oslo II regarding the West Bank town of Hebron.³⁴ The Hebron Agreement divided the city, apportioning 20 percent to its 450 Jewish settlers (designated as H2), and 80 percent to its 160,000 Palestinians (H1).³⁵ Appended to the Hebron Agreement was a “Note for the Record” in which both Arafat and Netanyahu “reaffirmed their commitment to implement the Interim Agreement [Oslo II] on the basis of reciprocity.”³⁶ Israeli responsibilities included further withdrawal from the West Bank (undetermined), a safe-passage route between the West Bank and Gaza, and the opening of the Gaza airport. Among the Palestinians’ responsibilities were fighting terror, security cooperation, and prevention of “incitement and hostile propaganda.”

After the signing of the accord, Netanyahu proposed a withdrawal from 9 percent of the West Bank, but encountered rejection from Arafat who felt the amount was insufficient. At the same time of this proposal Netanyahu announced plans to develop settlements on what the Jews call Har Homa (known to the Arabs as Jabal Abu Ghneim), a hill overlooking East Jerusalem. The plan to construct a 6,500-unit housing facility caused uproar around the world. Aside from protest and riots among Palestinians, the UN General Assembly passed resolutions with an overwhelming majority, emphasizing the illegality of settlement construction.³⁷ The vote went to the Security Council where only the United States voted against it, thus vetoing the resolution. Adding to the disturbance was a Hamas suicide bombing that killed three people in Tel Aviv three days after the Har Homa settlement construction began. Netanyahu blamed Arafat for the attack, suspended the Oslo progress, and proceeded with plans for new settlement expansion in the West Bank.

The rest of 1997 saw no movement on Oslo II or the Hebron Agreement. Efforts on the part of Clinton, Secretary of State Madeleine Albright, and special envoy Dennis Ross to reinvigorate negotiations yielded little in the way of progress, initially. It was not until 1998 that Clinton, Albright, and Ross obtained agreement from Netanyahu and Arafat to enter talks once again.

The Wye River Accord (1998)

At the Wye River Plantation in Maryland, on October 15, 1998, the two leaders met under US mediation, with Albright and CIA director George Tenet conducting the summit. On October 23 the Wye River Memorandum was signed in a ceremony at the White House; another footnote to Oslo had been attached.³⁸ The Palestinians were mainly given tasks regarding terrorism and security. Israel, in return, agreed to three redeployments, two detailed in the accord and another to be later addressed by a committee.³⁹ Under these terms, the West Bank’s new allocations (compared to Oslo) would break down as follows: Area A: 18.2 percent, Area B: 21.8 percent, and Area C: 60 percent.

After delays and limited withdrawal from Area C, Netanyahu’s position was suffering; hard-line politicians criticized his giving land away to the PA, and the more moderate and left elements questioned his ability and/or willingness to see the peace process through. Netanyahu suspended the Wye agreements and voted with the Knesset to call early elections.

The Sharm al-Sheikh Memorandum (1999)

Israel’s May 1999 elections brought the premiership of Ehud Barak, the country’s most highly decorated veteran and a political protégé of Yitzhak Rabin. Barak emerged as prime minister with determined talk of proceeding with Oslo and seeking a settlement with the Palestinians. Disagreement ensued almost immediately, however, when Barak stated he wished to move on to final-status talks with the Palestinians, as opposed to an incremental process on which the various accords had been styled – a bit of land for a bit of peace. In meetings with Clinton and Albright, an agreement was reached and signed on September 4, 1999. The Sharm al-Sheikh Memorandum established a timeline spelling out how and when Israel and the PA would “commit themselves to full and mutual implementation” of all agreements since September 1993.⁴⁰

Over the next two months negotiations took place in fits and starts. On final-status issues the Palestinians and the Israelis were too far apart: The Palestinian Authority wanted a state in the West Bank and Gaza, with East Jerusalem as its capital, and the return (or compensation) of the refugees. The Israelis refused to meet any of these points in full. Further, smaller disagreements regarding Israeli withdrawal from Area C caused the breakdown of the Sharm al-Sheikh agenda. Ehud Barak then decided to abandon the process in exchange for talks with Syria. After three months of negotiations with Damascus concentrating predominantly on the Golan Heights, which Israel had occupied since 1967, the Israeli–Syrian negotiations ended in futility. By March 2000, attention then returned to the Israel–Palestine domain.

CAMP DAVID II (2000)

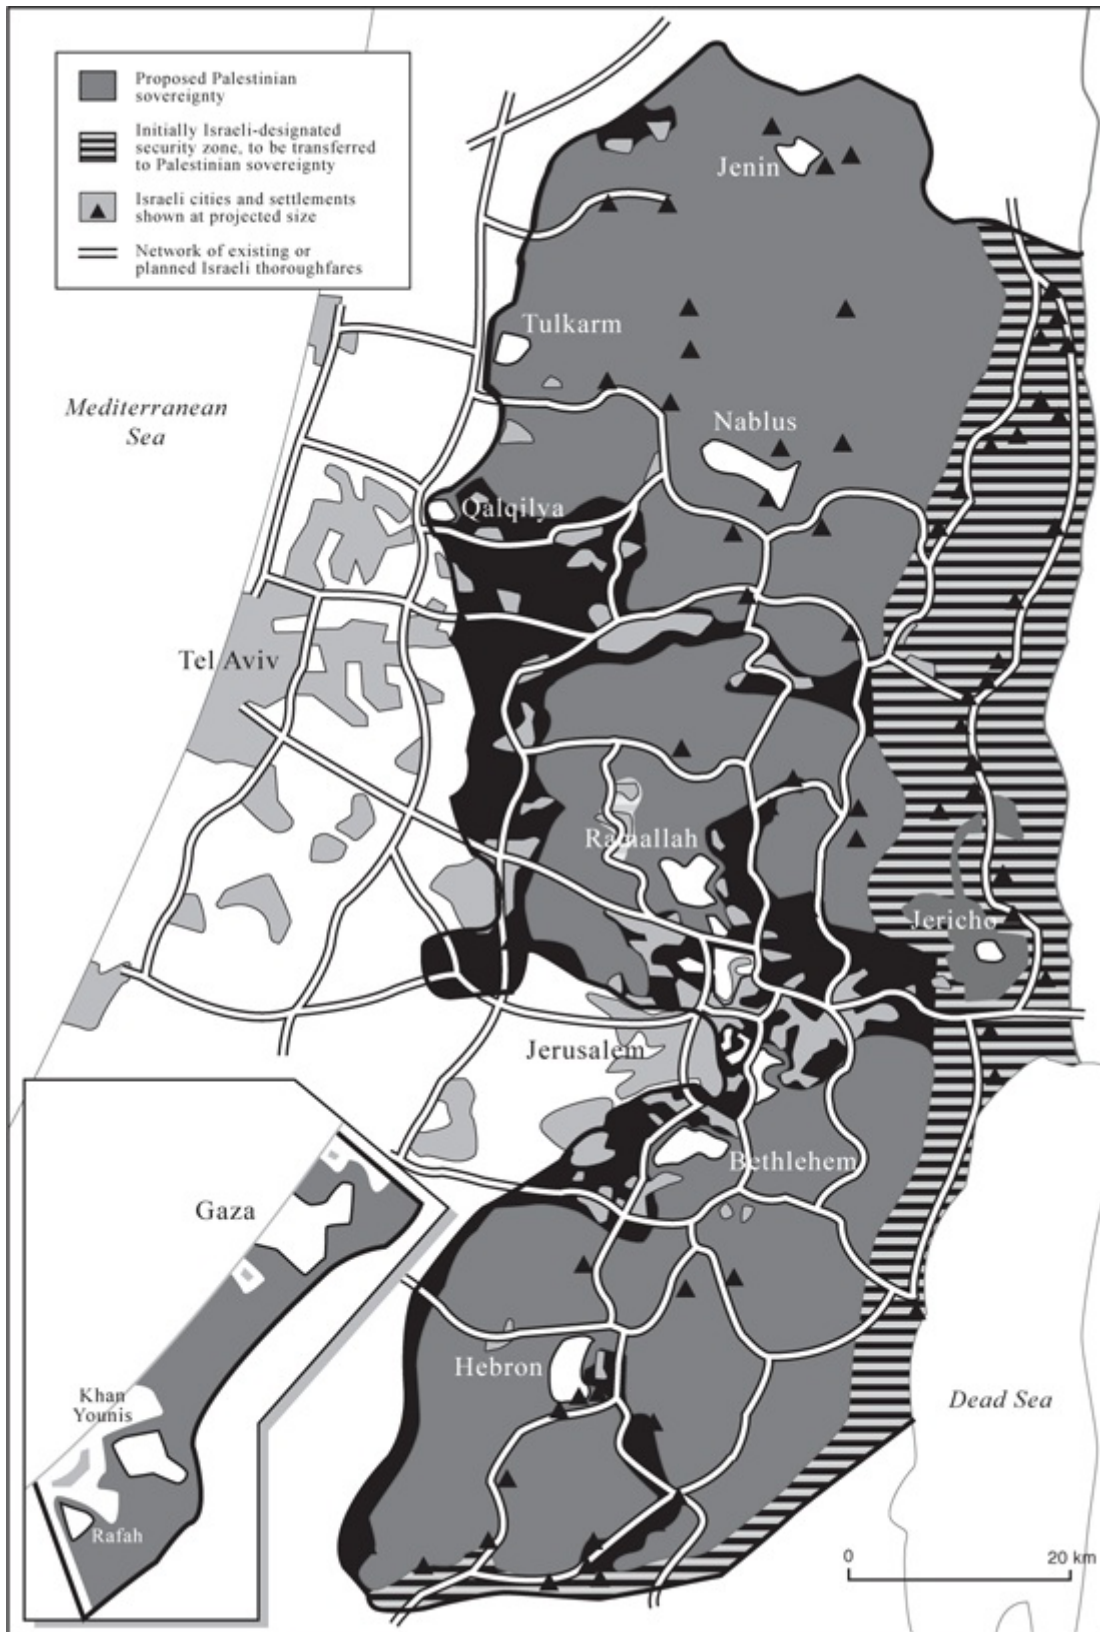

Note: So far we have covered the agreements in the post-Oslo period – Hebron, Wye, and Sharm – all of which are, as pointed out, basically footnotes to Oslo. Camp David II stands somewhat on its own, though is technically part of the Oslo cycle – mentioned here only for clarity, not due to it being a crucial issue.

Throughout spring 2000 preliminary talks and meetings took place between the United States, Israel, and the Palestinian Authority. Clinton and Albright put out feelers to determine if the time was “ripe,” as Albright put it, for a final summit. The situation had more to do with timing than anything else. Clinton was in the final hours of his second term in office, making him what is known as a “lame duck.” Barak, too, was eager to convene a summit. He was under severe domestic pressure from within the government and was up against a crumbling coalition majority in the Knesset, no-confidence motions, and the imminent call for early elections. Arafat was hesitant. He wanted more time to prepare for a final agreement, and felt wary of the impatient promptings on the part of Barak and Clinton.

On July 5, 2000, President Clinton extended invitations to Arafat and Barak to a summit at the presidential retreat in Maryland’s Catoctin Mountains where Carter, Begin, and Sadat had convened roughly 20 years before. The summit started on July 11 and lasted until July 25. Camp David II was and still is shrouded in a bit of mystery owing to the press “blackout,” and the lack of any written records or maps being produced during the proceedings; Israeli proposals were made orally and then channeled through American mediators. Moreover, the distance between the two parties’ fixed positions (“red lines”) would remain, contributing to an already unpromising atmosphere. As in previous negotiations, the Palestinians wanted a state within the Green Line, and East Jerusalem as its capital.

In May, during preliminary talks between Israeli and Palestinian negotiators, the former had presented a map serving as an “illustration” of what might be a possibility for the West Bank. What was offered was between 66 and 76 percent of the West Bank that would belong to the PA, with that percentage broken into four disconnected enclaves, or cantons, none sharing a border with the Jordan River or much of Israel.⁴¹ The Palestinians rejected this map outright. Barak eventually was offering at the summit approximately 90 percent of the West Bank, with annexation of settlement blocks accommodating roughly 80 percent of the West Bank's Jewish settlers. Israel was also planning on holding the Jordan Valley along the Jordan River for 20 years. The West Bank percentages are approximate and difficult to assess given the lack of documentation or maps. The offer of 90 percent of the West Bank contained provisos regarding settlers, security zones, and bypass roads between settlements. A percentage in the high-60s to low-80s is probably closer to the actual amount the Palestinians stood to regain, and with those portions in the West Bank being noncontiguous.⁴²

Map adapted from PASSIA / © Jan de Jong, 2001

Map 5 Projection of the West Bank Final Status Map presented by Israel, Camp David II, July 2000

Beyond division of the West Bank and Gaza, the issues of Jerusalem and refugees were also extremely difficult points at the summit. The PA demanded East Jerusalem where the Israelis offered Abu Dis instead. This village, just outside East Jerusalem, would then become al-Quds (Arabic for Jerusalem). In this scenario Israel would retain all of Jerusalem – East and West – while the Palestinians would have their own “Jerusalem” outside the city. Needless to say, there was no movement on this issue – the red lines were not about to budge. As for the right of return, held up by UN General Assembly Resolution 194,⁴³ the Palestinians were seeking return or compensation for all refugees. Israel, though refusing to acknowledge any legal or moral responsibility for the refugee problem, discussed accepting a limited number (never fully decided on) in a “family reunification” program, as well as an international compensation fund in which it would participate.⁴⁴

Note: At the time of Camp David II the number of refugees, including their descendants, according to the UN Relief and Works Agency for Palestinian Refugees (UNRWA), was 3.7 million. Currently UNRWA calculates some 5 million refugees.⁴⁵

Again, distance and rigidity prevailed. Two weeks after the summit commenced, Clinton called it to a close.

This “historic opportunity to reach an agreement on the permanent status,” as Clinton described it, produced considerable drama and sparse results. That said, the talks were not completely bereft of small accomplishments or merit. Almost two decades years later, Camp David II is seen, rightly or wrongly, as one of the pivotal points in the recent conflict. The mere discussion of issues like Jerusalem and refugees was in itself pathbreaking. Also noteworthy is that Ehud Barak made offers that were far more substantial than any of his predecessors. Yet, his offers bore little distinction from those made in May 2000, ones the Palestinians had rejected out of hand.

The fallout from Camp David consisted of a good deal of finger pointing, most of which was aimed at Arafat in accusation of inflexibility and refusal to issue counterproposals. Both Clinton and Barak condemned the Palestinian leader for the failures of the summit – something Clinton had promised not to do. While Arafat certainly was not guilty of over-flexibility – the PA being “more prone to caution than to creativity” was certainly a contributing element in Camp David II’s lack of substantive gains⁴⁷ – his position reflected that of most people in the occupied territories. The Palestinians felt that losing all but 22 percent of Palestine in 1948 was compromise enough, and that regaining the West Bank and Gaza was a reasonable minimum. As political scientist and former US National Security Council staff member William Quandt summarizes:

Arafat was widely suspected by his constituents of being too eager to become the first president of a Palestinian state. If the price [of Camp David II] were major territorial concessions to Israel or a relinquishment of rights in Jerusalem or concerning refugees, many Palestinians would oppose the deal. For most Palestinians, the acceptance of Israel within the 1967 lines was already a huge concession and should not be the starting point for further concessions.⁴⁸

In a co-authored article published a year after the summit, Robert Malley, a member of the negotiating team at Camp David and close adviser to Clinton, and Hussein Agha, a scholar involved in Palestinian–Israeli affairs, observe:

The war for the whole of Palestine was over because it had been lost. Oslo, as they saw it, was not about negotiating peace terms but terms of surrender. Bearing this perspective in mind explains the Palestinians' view that Oslo itself is the historic compromise – and agreement to concede 78 percent of mandatory Palestine to Israel.⁴⁹

Nevertheless, Arafat's refusal to meet Barak's terms translated into his perceived lack of commitment to peace and compromise.

The leaders returned home empty-handed, but not entirely without profit. Arafat was given a hero's welcome for having not given up anything at the summit. Barak found his way into the good graces of Clinton and Washington in general for having made groundbreaking concessions. His situation back home was less than solid, however. Certain concessions Barak was prepared to make caused further instability on the hard-line side of his government, and his all-or-nothing handling of the negotiations provoked criticism from the left. As for Clinton, he failed to achieve the legacy agreement he was aiming for, but most viewed his effort favorably. Quandt notes, however,

If there were a criticism that seemed valid, it would be not so much that Clinton mishandled the negotiations at Camp David, but that so little of the preceding seven years had been used to lay the basis for the substantive discussion of the issues that finally came into focus at the summit.⁵⁰

The Palestinians, irrespective of how well received Arafat was upon arriving home, grew weary with the peace process. The situation in the territories had not improved and did not look as though it would for the immediate, or not-so-immediate, future. Charges of corruption and betrayal against the PA were becoming recurrent. Autumn 2000 was starting to look a lot like autumn 1987.

The Second Intifada, Gaza, and the Obama Years: 2000–2016

Note: As we have seen, the overall situation of the conflict changes in small increments, and generally for the worse. What became known as the “peace process” (1991–2001) offered a period of relative calm and hope, but failed to transfigure the actual underpinnings of the conflict, namely, Israeli occupation and expansion, American support and protection of those policies, and Palestinian desire for legitimate statehood. We begin here on the eve of another expression of the demoralization in the occupied territories.

THE SECOND INTIFADA (2000–03)

On September 28, 2000, Ariel Sharon, the leader of the Likud party, paid a dramatic and controversial visit to the Temple Mount/Haram al-Sharif in Jerusalem. Accompanied by approximately 1,000 Israeli police officers and soldiers, Sharon made a number of symbolic gestures all at once. The day being the fifth anniversary of the signing of Oslo II was symbolic in itself. He was also asserting a posture that flew in the face of Ehud Barak and the concessions the prime minister was prepared to make at Camp David II. Sharon had been outspoken against transferring land to Palestinian control, and this highly publicized visit made it quite clear what his intentions and agenda would be if he took the position of prime minister. The Second Intifada, also known as the al-Aqsa Intifada, began the next day.

During Sharon’s visit demonstrators assembled to block access to Muslim holy sites. The Israeli Defense Forces responded by firing rubber-coated bullets and tear gas at the protesters. The following day, after Friday’s prayers, Palestinians poured out in protest, hurling stones at IDF soldiers and Jews praying at the Western Wall. Israeli forces fired into the crowds, this time with live ammunition, killing four Palestinians.¹ Tension and violence of this proportion set the tone for what would define this second uprising. The UN Security Council passed a resolution (1322) on October 10 addressing the disorder. The council stated that it deplored “the provocation carried out at Al-Haram Al-Sharif,” and that it condemned Israel’s “excessive use of force against Palestinians.”² Human rights organizations also denounced the IDF’s use of live ammunition and “lethal force” against unarmed demonstrators.³ According to a State Department document on human rights:

Deaths due to political violence increased significantly during the year due to the “al-Aqsa Intifada.” At least 365 persons were killed between late September and the end of December in demonstrations, violent clashes, and military and civilian attacks, including 325 Palestinians, 36 Israelis, [and four internationals]. Additionally, at least 10,962 persons were injured during this period, including 10,600 Palestinians and 362 Israelis.⁴

As the Second Intifada picked up momentum it took on the features of all-out warfare, more than a “shaking off.”

Televised images of senseless brutality became imprinted icons that would characterize this chapter in the conflict’s history. One scene caught on camera was twelve-year-old Muhammad al-Durra and his father, both squatting against a wall in Gaza, hiding from the gunfire. The boy is fatally shot, falling limp against his father who is wounded soon after. In another image, the lifeless body of an Israeli soldier is thrown from a police station window in Ramallah, further beaten and paraded by the angry mob below; he and a fellow reservist had both been murdered by crowd members after being taken to the station by Palestinian police.

The Intifada of 2000 came on like an explosion compared to 1987. What started with the implements of the First Intifada – stones, bottles, and burning tires – very quickly escalated into the exchange of automatic-weapon fire between the IDF and Palestinians (police, and even more so, paramilitary groups). Palestinians employed roadside bombs in addition to the traditional weapons. The IDF deployed tanks and combat helicopters in Palestinian towns and villages, imposing dusk-to-dawn and 24-hour curfews and closures against the populations.

The violence raged, despite a number of feeble and ineffective attempts to establish truces, and statements by Barak and Yasser Arafat to quell the chaos. Two weeks after the uprising erupted President Bill Clinton convened a summit in Sharm al-Sheikh to attempt a truce. An unwritten arrangement was settled, with both sides agreeing to make statements calling for an end to violence, participate in an international fact-finding committee to determine the causes of the violence, and promise to return to negotiations.⁵ (Notice the similarity here, especially the call for a fact-finding mission, to British handling of Arab unrest in the prior era.) No implementation would follow. Further reluctant and ineffectual meetings took place between the Israelis and the Palestinian Authority, but to no avail. Arafat approached Russian president Vladimir Putin in Moscow, among other efforts to secure international involvement, again with no success.

With the approach of the new year came new leadership in the United States, as well as Israel where elections were due in February 2001. The November 2000 US elections between Vice President Al Gore and Texas governor George W. Bush, son of former president George H. W. Bush, created a period of distraction in America. With Gore winning the popular vote but the electoral vote hinging on Florida where a ballot controversy ensued, the Supreme Court settled the matter and declared Bush the 43rd president. The two-month space between Bush’s victory and his assumption of office, however, featured a final diplomatic endeavor from the Clinton White House.

The Clinton Plan and the Taba Statement

On December 23, 2000, Clinton assembled Ehud Barak’s and Yasser Arafat’s negotiators at the White House, a group closely resembling that of Camp David II. As was becoming customary for the peace process, the Clinton Plan was presented verbally in the form of a speech delivered by the president.⁶ Clinton essentially called for: (1) a Palestinian state consisting of Gaza and roughly 94–96 percent of the West Bank, allowing for “contiguity” and “80 percent of settlers in blocks” (though no maps were produced showing how these points would be compatible); (2) the principle that “Arab areas are Palestinian and Jewish ones are Israeli,” and East Jerusalem with al-Quds (Abu Dis) becoming the Palestinian capital; and (3) an undetermined but sketched-out plan to settle the refugee problem, focusing on the right of return to the Palestinian state (the West Bank and Gaza). In substance, what was proposed differed very little from what had been discussed before and during Camp David II. However, both sides cautiously, conditionally, and reluctantly accepted Clinton's parameters.⁷

What followed was a round of negotiations in Taba, Egypt (January 21–27), resulting in the Taba Statement.⁸ Though merely a declaration of intent and an expression of the “spirit of hope and mutual achievement,” for some Taba represented a high-water mark, especially amid the din of continuing violence and bloodshed.

BUSH, SHARON, AND THE INTIFADA

Whether the peace process was heading toward authentic peace, or just creating a pacifying illusion of progress, what replaced it was deterioration with little hope of improvement. Upon taking office, George W. Bush's administration decided to put more space between itself and the conflict. The February 2001 elections in Israel brought the defeat of Ehud Barak and the election of Ariel Sharon as prime minister. The distance that the White House put between itself and the conflict was commensurate with the distance Sharon put between his government and any continued negotiations. He had been outspoken for much of his career against transferring territory to the Palestinians, giving back any of Jerusalem, or the return of refugees.

The reaction in the occupied territories was disbelief at his election, and anticipation of things getting worse, not better; the Palestinians were familiar with his career, especially his orchestration of the 1982 invasion of Lebanon. Bush, though removed from the situation, voiced his support for Sharon, identifying with his struggle against terrorism. Both leaders held Arafat responsible for the violence of the Intifada; Sharon made many visits to the White House while Arafat was never invited for this very reason. The mantra recited continually to Arafat from each leader was: Until the terror and violence cease, nothing.

Under these new circumstances, the violence of the Intifada grew worse. The trend of suicide bombings, which began at the end of Barak's term, dramatically increased under Sharon. Both religious (Hamas, Islamic Jihad) and secular Palestinian groups (Tanzim, al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigade) engaged in acts of violence aimed almost exclusively at harming and killing Israeli civilians. Shopping malls, restaurants, and public buses were common sites of suicide attacks. Between November 2000 and mid-July 2003, the number of Israeli civilians killed by Palestinian civilians inside Israel was 317.

Suicide bombings became firmly integrated into the provocation–reprisal pattern characterizing the Second Intifada. Among the typical responses by the IDF were “targeted killings,” or assassinations (a method still practiced), of the various leaders and members of the organizations responsible for suicide bombing. From September 2000 to June 2004, 149 Palestinians were killed extra-judicially (outside court involvement) by Israel. In the course of these assassinations 100 additional Palestinians were killed – generally bystanders.

Another form of punishment employed by the Israeli military was house demolitions. The residences of individuals suspected of involvement in terrorist activity were targeted for destruction, and most commonly bulldozed to rubble. Not a new policy, it was discontinued in 1997 and renewed in October 2001. From its reinstatement to January 2005, Israel demolished

668 homes in the occupied territories. These policies of targeted killings and home demolition continue to bring condemnation of Israel from human rights organizations, the international community, and the UN.⁹

The relationship between Sharon and Bush developed further in the wake of an unprecedented attack on the United States on September 11, 2001. Terrorists hijacking four commercial aircraft flew two planes into the World Trade Center towers in New York City and one into the Pentagon in Washington DC, with the fourth crashing in a field in Pennsylvania. Nearly 3,000 people were killed. These terrorist acts were perpetrated by members of a network called al-Qaida (“the Base”). Al-Qaida operated then under the inspiration and guidance of Osama bin Laden, the son of a wealthy Saudi businessman, and a sworn enemy of the West (mainly the United States) and its intervention in the Middle East.¹⁰ With Bush’s declared “war on terror,” Sharon saw common cause with his own fight against Palestinian terror in Israel – referring to Arafat as “Israel’s bin Laden”¹¹ – and intensified the level of IDF response against the Intifada. To further carry out this initiative, the Sharon government reoccupied most of Oslo’s Areas A and B in spring 2002.

In a maneuver called Operation Defensive Shield, ostensibly in response to suicide bombings (such as the “Passover massacre” killing 29 Israelis), the IDF, over the course of late March to late April, re-entered the territories they had withdrawn from after Oslo. In the process, the infrastructure of the Palestinian Authority in Ramallah was bombed and detonated. Buildings out of which the PA ran its civilian and security offices and agencies were leveled. Despite Security Council resolutions calling for an immediate end to the violence, Israel continued its reoccupation of major cities in the West Bank, the worst destruction and fighting occurring in Nablus and the Jenin refugee camp. The overall operation claimed the lives of 497 Palestinians. According to the UN, “Over 2,800 refugee housing units were damaged and 878 homes were demolished or destroyed ... leaving more than 17,000 people homeless or in need of shelter rehabilitation.”¹² The next plan Sharon implemented to deal with terror is what is alternately referred to as a security fence, a separation barrier, and a wall.

Note: According to the Israeli human rights organization B’Tselem, from the beginning of the Intifada to November 2004, 3,040 Palestinians were killed in the occupied territories by Israeli soldiers, 606 of them minors. Inside Israel, 429 Israeli civilians were killed by Palestinians (residents of the occupied territories), 78 of them minors, while 210 Israeli civilians were killed inside the occupied territories, most being settlers. There is no precise date marking the end of the Second Intifada. Though 2003 could safely be seen as its final year, present-tense discussion of it among some news outlets went well into 2004.

THE WALL

Considered first as an option in the 1990s, Israel began construction of the barrier in June 2002. Starting at the north end of the West Bank, the barrier loosely traces the border as it heads south, mostly within the international boundary of the Green Line – on the Palestinian side – and frequently snaking deep into the West Bank, claiming large portions of land. Its composition varies along its path, sometimes chain-link and razor wire, and sometimes a 25-foot-high concrete wall. Construction continues today with 273 of its projected 449 miles completed as of 2012.¹³ As stated by Israel's Ministry of Defense:

The "Security Fence" is a manifestation of Israel's basic commitment to defend its citizens, and once completed, it will improve the ability of the IDF to prevent the infiltration of terrorists and criminal elements into Israel for the purpose of carrying out terrorist attacks or the smuggling of arms and explosives.¹⁴

Israel has come under harsh condemnation from human rights organizations and the UN, all calling into question the legality of the wall being built inside the West Bank. The UN General Assembly passed two resolutions in 2003, stating that it was

Gravely concerned at the commencement and continuation of construction by Israel, the occupying Power, of a wall in the Occupied Palestinian Territory, including in and around East Jerusalem, which is in departure from the Armistice Line of 1949 (Green Line) and which has involved the confiscation and destruction of Palestinian land and resources, the disruption of the lives of thousands of protected civilians and the de facto annexation of large areas of territory, and underlining the unanimous opposition by the international community to the construction of that wall.¹⁵

The International Court of Justice (ICJ; the UN's highest court) also added to the international criticism of the barrier, stating in its July 2004 ruling that construction of the barrier is equivalent to annexation of West Bank land and that "the wall" is "contrary to international law."¹⁶ The barrier remains a controversial subject and has become elemental in the conflict. Israelis generally support its construction, with approval ratings for it reaching as high as 80 percent.¹⁷ Palestinians, especially those directly affected by the wall, fear the long-term political ramifications and resent the day-to-day consequences of being separated from schools, hospitals, and farms. Israel maintains the barrier is a temporary measure, but skepticism abounds in the occupied territories, pointing at its cost of roughly $4 million a mile.¹⁸

In early 2006, Israeli prime minister Ehud Olmert revealed in an interview what many observers had suspected from the start: "I believe ... that in four years' time Israel will be disengaged from the vast majority of the Palestinian population, within new borders, with the route of the fence – which until now has been a security fence – adjusted to the new line of the permanent borders."¹⁹ Making note of this admission in its World Report 2007, Human Rights Watch commented:

Map adapted from UN-OCHA, June 2007

Currently, 85 percent of the wall's route extends into the West Bank; if the wall were to become a permanent border, it would mean Israel's annexation of approximately 10 percent of the West Bank, including all major settlements there, all of which are illegal under the Fourth Geneva Convention, as well as some of the most productive Palestinian farmlands and key water resources.²⁰

THE ROSE GARDEN AND THE ROAD MAP

As for diplomatic endeavors or resumption of the peace process, the Bush administration stepped lightly. Clinton's call for a fact-finding committee at Sharm al-Sheikh (see p. 170) produced the Mitchell Committee (named after a senator on the delegation), which submitted its report on April 30, 2001.²¹ The Mitchell Report principally asked of the Intifada: What happened? and Why did it happen? With headings in the document like "Resume Negotiations," "End the Violence," and "Rebuild Confidence," the report suggested they "find a path back to the peace process," without placing blame on either of the parties. In its lists of suggestions, the document calls for Israel to "freeze all settlement activity." Though generally accepting the report's ideas, Sharon was not about to comply with a halt to settlement construction and expansion.²² The Palestinians accepted the document. Much like the Sharm al-Sheikh meeting in October 2000 that inspired the commission, no implementation followed.

A year later, on June 24, 2002, President Bush gave a national address from the White House Rose Garden stating, "My vision is two states [Israel and Palestine], living side by side in peace and security." But the president noted that "Peace requires a new and different Palestinian leadership, so that a Palestinian state can be born."²³ Open discussion of and plans for a Palestinian state was new rhetoric for an American president, as was Bush's comment that "permanent occupation [of Palestine] threatens Israel's identity and democracy." Yet, Bush focused almost exclusively on Palestinian reform as a prerequisite for any movement on resolution of the conflict. (This view was shared by Israel's leadership, which released a statement from Ariel Sharon's office after the Bush address stating that advancement would not be possible until "the PA undertakes genuine reforms under new leadership so that there is a different authority."²⁴) Though Bush never mentioned Yasser Arafat by name, it was clear enough. The Palestinians praised the president's speech, and its discussion of the occupation: "the Israeli occupation that began in 1967 will be ended through a settlement negotiated between the parties, based on UN Resolutions 242 and 338, with Israeli withdrawal to secure and recognize borders." (Bush was initially calling for Israeli withdrawal to the September 28 pre-Intifada positions.) However, regarding the president's call for leadership change, the PA was quick to point out that "Arafat was elected by the Palestinian people in a direct election" and that "President Bush must respect the choice of the Palestinian people."²⁵

With the encouragement of Britain's prime minister, Tony Blair, Bush set out to formulate a new process to address the Palestine-Israel conflict. At this time the United States was gearing up for its invasion of Iraq (Operation Iraqi Freedom, 2003-11) and the overthrow of its leader, Saddam Hussein, and Blair thought the declaration of a peace plan might illustrate the West's seriousness on the issue.²⁶ On April 30, 2003, the "Quartet" – the United States, the European Union, the UN, and Russia – issued the "Road Map." The document established a three-phase

“performance-based” plan for a “comprehensive settlement of the Israel-Palestinian conflict by 2005.”²⁷

The proposal called for “good faith efforts” from both parties for successful implementation. As part of Phase I, both sides were to cease all violence and incitement. The Palestinians were to begin reforming and rebuilding the Palestinian Authority, including the appointment of a prime minister. The Israelis were to improve the humanitarian situation in the occupied territories, freeze all settlement activity (as called for in the Mitchell Report), and “dismantle settlement outposts erected since March 2001” (when Sharon took office).

The contents of the Road Map were reasserted at the Aqaba Summit in Aqaba, Jordan, in June 2003. Among those in attendance were President Bush, Ariel Sharon, Jordan’s King Abdullah II, and Mahmoud Abbas, who had recently been appointed prime minister of the Palestinian Authority, and who would function as a replacement for Arafat. (Abbas resigned four months into his position, and was replaced by Ahmed Qurei.) Bush, Sharon, and Abbas gave addresses expressing, in their own way, their support of the newly invigorated peace process, and their willingness to work “toward true peace.”²⁸

The Saudi Proposal, People’s Voice, and the Geneva Accord

In February 2002, Saudi Arabia floated a peace initiative in an interview conducted by New York Times columnist Thomas Friedman with then-Crown Prince (later King) Abdullah, the essence being land-for-peace. In Friedman’s words:

In return for a total withdraw by Israel to the June 4, 1967, lines, and the establishment of a Palestinian state, the 22 members of the Arab league would offer Israel full diplomatic relations, normalized trade and security guarantees. Full withdrawal ... for full peace between Israel and the entire Arab world.²⁹

The following month the plan was presented to the Arab League summit in Beirut, where it met with unanimous approval. Afterward, the Saudi foreign minister told a news conference, “This is the way toward security ... Israel can’t keep the land and want security at the same time. It has to withdraw and give the Palestinian [sic] their rights. If Israel does that, the Arab states will put an end to the state of war. That will give Israel its security.”³⁰ The White House and the Israeli leadership expressed reserved interest in the proposal. The proposal continues to crop up.

Along with the Road Map and the Saudi/Arab plan, this period also featured independent initiatives, an expression of frustration with the lack of movement on the part of American, Israeli, and Palestinian leaders. Moreover, the proposals indicated the willingness and ability on the part of Israelis and Palestinians to sit down, negotiate, and produce reasonable results.

The first significant back-channel effort to be announced was the Ayalon–Nusseibeh plan, also known as the “People’s Voice.” The one-page “statement of principles” was produced by Sari Nusseibeh, the Palestinian president of Jerusalem’s Al-Quds University, and Ami Ayalon, a retired Israeli Navy commander and former head of the Shin Bet security agency. Signed in the summer of 2002 but presented in June 2003, the six-point plan called for: (1) two states for two nations; (2) permanent borders based on the June 4, 1967, lines; (3) Jerusalem to be an open city and the capital of both states; (4) Palestinian refugees to be allowed to return to the territories of the Palestinian state only, or compensation; and (5) the Palestinian state to be demilitarized. The document closes with its sixth point, upholding that full implementation of these principles would end the conflict.³¹ Though gathering hundreds of thousands of signatures and gaining a measure of media attention, the People’s Voice exists merely as a possible paradigm.

A second initiative, drawing far more attention than its predecessor, was the Geneva Accord. The talks producing the agreement were principally steered by two veteran negotiators directly involved in the peace process: Yossi Beilin, a chief Oslo architect on the Israeli side, and Yasser Abed Rabbo, a former minister of the PA. Made public in October 2003 after two years of negotiations, but officially unveiled in Geneva, Switzerland, that December, the Beilin–Abed Rabbo plan was conceived as an “Eighth Day of Tabá,” in essence, an effort to complete what was started with the Clinton parameters but had lain fallow ever since. The basic elements of the 50-page Geneva Accord are as follows: A two-state solution – Israel and Palestine – based on the 1967 Green Line; a corridor linking the West Bank and Gaza; a demilitarized Palestinian state; “mutually recognized capitals in the areas of Jerusalem under their respective sovereignty”; and return of refugees to Palestine and/or compensation. Overall, a more developed version of the Clinton Plan, and one not altogether distinct from Ayalon–Nusseibeh.³²

The Geneva agreement, however, struck a chord internationally. Prominent individuals such as former presidents Jimmy Carter and Bill Clinton, then-UN secretary general Kofi Annan, Nelson Mandela, and former Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev, among many others, voiced endorsement of the initiative. Additionally, polls conducted among the two populations indicated that 53 percent of the Israelis and almost 56 percent of the Palestinians were in support of the plan.³³ Regarding senior leadership, on the other hand, response on the part of Washington was between cool and dismissive, while Ariel Sharon rejected the effort entirely. Yasser Arafat voiced distanced support in a letter read at the ceremony, referring to the “brave and courageous initiative.”³⁴ Aside from the flurry of media attention and follow-up discourse surrounding the proposal, the Geneva Accord has become something of a “set of papers gathering dust in the archives,” as Yossi Beilin admitted might end up being its fate.³⁵

THE DEATH OF YASSER ARAFAT

In autumn 2004, four decades of Palestinian leadership under Yasser Arafat came to an end. He had spent the last of his few years holed up in his compound, the Muqata, in Ramallah, West Bank, being denied by Ariel Sharon’s government travel to Gaza and Israel proper – or to any international location, if he wished to return. But, in view of his failing health the Palestinian leader was granted travel to a military hospital in Paris, France, for medical attention. Going into a coma shortly after arriving, he died on November 11 at the age of 75. Following a military funeral in Egypt, the leader’s remains were flown back to Ramallah where he was interred, surrounded by thousands of his people. Denied burial in Jerusalem by Israel, soil from the Al-Aqsa Mosque there was used in the interment.

Arafat’s death is shrouded in lingering mystery as to what caused his illness. Though his medical records indicated Arafat died from “a stroke that resulted from a bleeding disorder caused by an unidentified infection,” many Palestinians suspect the president was poisoned. A later investigation concluded he was not murdered, though the underlying cause of the infection remains unexplained.³⁶

As George W. Bush’s second term was about to begin, after his defeat of Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts, ballots were cast (January 9, 2005) throughout the West Bank, Gaza, and East Jerusalem for a new president of the Palestinian Authority. In a clear victory, former prime minister Mahmoud Abbas won 62 percent of the vote, with six challengers trailing him. Declaring victory shortly after the election, Abbas announced to supporters: “Difficult and complicated missions face us – to establish a state with security and respect for our citizens, to give our prisoners freedom, to give our fugitives a dignified life and to reach our goal of a Palestinian state with Jerusalem as its capital.”³⁷ President Bush announced his support for Abbas’s victory, voicing optimism from Washington and noting the historical significance of the election. Ariel Sharon, too, phoned in congratulatory remarks to the president-elect.

THE DISENGAGEMENT PLAN

In February 2004, Ariel Sharon officially announced a plan (devised in 2003, but discussed as early as 2002) to withdraw, or “disengage,” from the Gaza Strip. The Disengagement Plan, as it was called, was passed in the Knesset later in the year, declaring that Israel “will evacuate the Gaza Strip, including all the Israeli settlements currently existing there, and will redeploy outside the territory of the Strip.” But regardless of withdrawal from the territory’s interior, “Israel will supervise and guard the external envelope on land, will maintain exclusive control in the air space of Gaza, and will continue to conduct military activities in the sea space of the Gaza Strip.”³⁸ The controversial plan elicited strong feelings across the political spectrum: From right-wing nationalists and religious fundamentalists Sharon’s plan was alternately viewed as a sacrilegious surrender of Jewish land, a trap that would tether Israel to the Road Map, and a setback for the settlement movement. Criticism from the left was based on the unilateral nature of the plan, viewing it as a means of railroading the peace process and instead focusing on the de facto establishment of borders in the West Bank via settlement and wall construction. Sharon’s senior adviser, Dov Weisglass, however, made remarks in the Israeli press indicating the general mindset:

The disengagement plan is ... the bottle of formaldehyde within which you place the [American] president’s formula so that it will be preserved for a very lengthy period. The disengagement is actually formaldehyde. It supplies the amount of formaldehyde that’s necessary so that there will not be a political process with the Palestinians.

Weisglass also pointed toward the external support for Israel’s agenda in the occupied territories: The significance is the freezing of the political process. And when you freeze that process you prevent the establishment of a Palestinian state and you prevent a discussion about the refugees, the borders and Jerusalem. Effectively, this whole package that is called the Palestinian state, with all that it entails, has been removed from our agenda indefinitely. And all this with authority and permission [from Washington]. All with a [US] presidential blessing and the ratification of both houses of Congress. What more could have been anticipated? What more could have been given to the settlers?³⁹

Gideon Saar, Likud leader in the Israeli parliament, stated the position more succinctly: “Anyone who thinks that it is Gaza first is mistaken. It is Gaza only.”⁴⁰

Aside from preliminary removal of military equipment and preparatory measures, the actual withdrawal took place in mid-August 2005, lasting just under a week. Israeli army and police personnel conducted the evacuations, which moved 15,000 civilians (including 6,000 non-residents) out of 21 settlements in Gaza and four in the northern West Bank. Though resistance occurred and arrests were made, the process of disengagement went relatively smoothly. After the settlements were emptied, the IDF finished the process and left the Gaza Strip early September 12, ending its 38-year presence in the territory. At a flag-lowering ceremony the night before, Brigadier General Aviv Kochavi, commander of the Israeli forces in Gaza, said, “The gate that is closing after us is also a gate that is opening.”⁴¹ Yet, despite the brigadier’s optimism, life for Gazans has further degraded since Israel’s withdrawal. As an executive director of Human Rights Watch stated in a report on the disengagement: “Under international law, the test for determining whether an occupation exists is effective control by a hostile army, not the positioning of troops. Whether the Israeli army is inside Gaza or redeployed around its periphery and restricting entrance and exit, it remains in control.”⁴²

ENTER HAMAS

Post-disengagement Gaza, while initially calm, was soon marked by radical Islamic groups firing rockets – typically crude, ineffective Qassams – at Israeli towns in the general vicinity such as Sderot. Israel, in turn, responded with helicopter airstrikes and resumption of its policy of targeted killings. This violence began in late September and stretched into 2006, eventually precipitating Israeli devastation of Gaza that summer, which we will discuss in the next section. This section will focus on the political developments of January 2006 on both sides, each ushering in a new era.

Having been hospitalized only a couple of weeks prior for a mild stroke, Ariel Sharon, on January 4, suffered a massive cerebral hemorrhage and was rushed to a hospital in Jerusalem where he underwent numerous operations; the former prime minister remained in a vegetative state until he died on January 11, 2014. With a unanimous vote in the Knesset declaring Sharon incapacitated (April 11), his deputy prime minister, Ehud Olmert, moved from acting to full premiership; elections were held the previous month, resulting in the victory of the Kadima party (meaning “forward” in Hebrew and started by Sharon upon leaving Likud in late 2005) making Olmert the twelfth Israeli to serve as prime minister.

Palestinian politics also took a somewhat unexpected turn. Parliamentary elections on January 25 resulted in the overwhelming victory of the Islamist resistance movement Hamas, taking 76 of the legislature’s 132 seats, defying polling predictions, and surprising nearly everyone – perhaps including Hamas itself. With the desire to fulfill the hopes of its founder, Sheik Ahmed Yassin (assassinated by Israel in 2004), Hamas announced its candidacy “as a platform to defend the resistance and to confront those who try to tamper with the rights of the Palestinian people, mainly the right to resist the occupation.”⁴³ Regardless of Washington’s efforts to financially support Abbas’s party, Fatah, in the campaign period – which in turn may have done it harm – Hamas’s image of resistance, social work, and lack of corruption versus Fatah’s image of graft, division, and subservience to Israel and the United States won over the electorate’s desire and demand for change.⁴⁴

But the Palestinian people ended up paying the penalties for electing an organization viewed by the United States and Israel as a terrorist entity and an unacceptable interlocutor. Immediately, Israel froze its monthly payments of over $50 million, comprised of customs and tax receipts normally collected for and paid to the Palestinian Authority.⁴⁵ The maneuver to withhold revenue that supported “the most foreign-aid dependent society on earth” (Christian Science Monitor) was casually described by Dov Weisglass: “The idea is to put the Palestinians on a diet.”⁴⁶

The United States, along with the European Union, followed suit with suspension of aid, hinging its resumption on Hamas meeting the three oft-repeated “international demands”: recognition of Israel’s right to exist, renunciation of violence, and acceptance of previous peace agreements. “The intention,” reported the New York Times, “is to starve the Palestinian Authority of money and international connections to the point where ... [the] Palestinians will be so unhappy with life under Hamas that they will return to office a reformed and chastened Fatah movement.”⁴⁷ The inability to pay over 150,000 state employees, most receiving between nothing and 50 percent of their salaries, was just one example of the effects brought to bear by such sanctions. Though aid increased between 2006 and 2007, the bulk of the assistance was to address immediate humanitarian concerns, not long-term, infrastructural development. Furthermore, the boycott continued until June 2007, making a bad situation far worse in the occupied territories, with Gaza bearing the preponderance of the hardship.⁴⁸

Note: The three international demands placed on Hamas became and remain a fixture in the reportage. They are upheld by the Quartet, and were formalized in a statement made less than a week after Hamas’s electoral victory. Kofi Annan, at a press conference with representatives of the international panel that sponsored the Road Map, stated: “It is the view of the Quartet that all members of the future Palestinian government must be committed to nonviolence, recognition of Israel and acceptance of previous agreements and obligations, including the roadmap.”⁴⁹ The then-secretary general also attached “future assistance” to Hamas’s commitment to these criteria. Despite a year-long ceasefire (at the time of elections) that the Islamist group had initiated in early 2005 and honored of its own accord (lasting 18 months in total), as well as approximate satisfaction of the subsequent two demands, US–EU–Israeli rejection of the organization’s presence in the government remains absolute.⁵⁰

SUMMER 2006: ISRAEL, GAZA, AND LEBANON

Operation Summer Rains: Israel and Gaza

Violence between Israel and Gaza continued well into the post-disengagement period, marked by continual Israeli airstrikes against militants and alleged bomb-manufacturing locations. The toll on the civilian population in these targeted killings, as mentioned, is generally significant. But regardless of the expected consequences of firing at human targets from helicopter gunships – well over a dozen civilians killed with more wounded in June 2006 alone – Prime Minister Olmert vowed to continue the policy, stating “I am deeply sorry for the residents of Gaza, but the lives, security and well-being of the residents of Sderot is even more important.”⁵¹ At the end of June the violence reached war-like proportions.

In an under-reported incident on June 24, the Israeli military, in its first incursion since the August 2005 withdrawal, entered Gaza and kidnapped two civilians.⁵² The two brothers, Osama and Mustafa Abu Muamar, were suspected by Israel of involvement with Hamas terrorist activity, while Palestinian sources, including Hamas, maintained that the two were sons of a Hamas activist and not involved with the organization. On the following day, Palestinian militants attacked an IDF post just outside a border crossing at the south end of the Strip, killing two and abducting a third, Corporal Gilad Shalit. Not only a response to June 24, the capture of the soldier was seen by many observers in the context of Israel holding at the time approximately 9,000 Palestinians prisoners, with 750 of them being held under “administrative detention,” in other words, without charge or trial – considered by many as a form of abduction.⁵³ Nevertheless, Shalit’s capture touched off a media storm, with Ehud Olmert ordering immediate attacks on Gaza under the codename Operation Summer Rains.

Two days after the corporal’s abduction, IDF troops and tanks advanced into Gaza, backed by aerial bombardment. The assault included the bombing of roads, bridges, water tanks, and power plants, with 75 percent of the territory’s electricity being knocked out. Broadening its response, Israeli soldiers seized 64 members of Hamas in the West Bank, including 23 legislators from parliament. In addition, Israeli fighter jets buzzed the home of Syrian president Bashar al-Assad in Damascus, outwardly sending a message to the Hamas leadership living in Syria, namely, Khaled Meshaal, whom Israel was alleged to have orchestrated the June 25 attack and capture.⁵⁴

The incursion lasted well into autumn when a ceasefire, brokered and agreed to by Israel and the Palestinian Authority, went into effect on November 26, bringing a brief cessation of the death and destruction, and Israel’s (second) withdrawal from the coastal territory.

According to the Israeli human rights organization B’Tselem, from the capture of Shalit to the end of 2006, Israeli forces killed 405 Palestinians in the Gaza Strip, including 88 minors, with 205 not participating in the fighting. For the whole year of 2006, Palestinians killed 17 Israeli civilians, both in the West Bank and inside Israel (including one minor), and six members of the Israeli security forces.⁵⁵ (Shalit was released five years later in October 2011 in a negotiated prisoner swap, with Israel freeing roughly a thousand Palestinian detainees in the exchange.)

As the five months of profound violence set off (at least immediately) by the events of June 24–25 continued to rage, this would merely be the southern theater of that summer’s hostilities.

The 34-Day War: Israel and Hizballah

The northern theater was located on the “Blue Line,” the international border between Israel and Lebanon. On July 12, members of the guerrilla organization Hizballah (p. 158) stole across the border, capturing two IDF soldiers and killing eight. Similar to the Palestinian action not three weeks prior, this incident also unleashed Israeli firepower from the sky, as well as a tank-led ground assault, on South Lebanon. Something Hizballah likely planned in advance – and something Israel was more or less anticipating – taking the soldiers captive was yet another instance of cross-border violations common between the IDF and the Shiite paramilitary group.⁵⁶ Just as in the case of Palestinian detainees in administrative detention, Israel also holds Lebanese prisoners, for whom Hizballah has traded captured soldiers in the past; prisoner swaps between the two parties are not uncommon.⁵⁷ “Hizballah’s official line,” reported the Financial Times, “was that the capture was aimed at winning the release of the few remaining Lebanese prisoners in Israeli jails.” In addition, “the timing and scale of its attack suggest it was partly intended to reduce the pressure on the Palestinians by forcing Israel to fight on two fronts simultaneously.”⁵⁸

Deemed by the International Red Cross as a violation of the “principle of proportionality” enshrined in international law,⁵⁹ Israel’s large-scale response to July 12 was something the Lebanese fighters allegedly did not expect. According to interviews with Hizballah leader Hasan Nasrallah, the assumption was that because of the business-as-usual nature of the abduction, coupled with the fact that the IDF was already preoccupied with its efforts in Gaza, the Israelis would “count to one thousand” before taking on South Lebanon as well.⁶⁰ This would not be the case. The ordnance visited upon South Lebanon, by air, land, and sea, destroyed roads and bridges by the score, water and sewage treatment facilities, power plants, fuel stations, seaports, Beirut's international airport, and caused immense devastation to commercial and residential property. (Much of the infrastructural damage followed reconstruction, a pattern Lebanon knows well.) The Israeli Air Force (IAF) launched over 7,000 airstrikes, along with the navy's 2,500 bombardments, wreaking the above-mentioned physical ruin along with displacing close to a million people (roughly a quarter of the country's population) and killing an estimated 850–1,200 civilians.

Hizballah, which lost approximately 250–500 fighters, nevertheless showed surprising and significant resilience in the war. Its fighters inflicted severe and abundant damage on IDF equipment, including destruction of tanks and a gunboat off the coast of Beirut, sustained a month-long conflict with a vastly superior military power, and remained intact when the dust settled. Over the course of the war, Hizballah killed over 100 IDF soldiers and fired some 3,000 rockets into northern Israel, frequently into civilian population centers including Haifa (Israel's third-largest city), displacing a half-million people and killing 43.⁶¹

Discussion of the war between Israel and Hizballah invites much more in the way of surrounding factors; the kidnapped soldiers and the IDF's response are a very limited part of the picture. In short, the battle waged across the Blue Line can be viewed as a proxy war, with the United States seeking to weaken Hizballah in the event of military engagement between the United States and Iran, a strong supporter of the guerrilla organization and provider for its war chest. Tensions between Washington and Tehran had been building at the time over Iran's development of nuclear technology, for what Tehran claimed was a domestic program and what the White House suspected was for arms development. (A subsequent agreement was achieved in July 2015, indicating a thaw between the two.) Given the White House's desire to "strangle the axis of Hezbollah, Hamas, Syria and Iran" (Washington Post), one goal was to provide "a demo for Iran" and send the Iranian leadership a message of what could potentially come their way.⁶² Moreover, in the actuality of such a decision, Washington (and Israel) would benefit from a neutralized South Lebanon. "It was our intent to have Hezbollah diminished," a Pentagon consultant told veteran investigative journalist Seymour Hersh in the New Yorker, "and now we have someone else doing it."⁶³

HAMAS TAKES GAZA

Disengagement, isolation, and devastating military operations by Israel throughout the second half of 2006 created disastrous conditions for Gaza. The Israeli human rights organization Gisha, in an extensive January 2007 report on post-disengagement, maintained that

Israeli actions since September 2005 – including severe restrictions on the movement of people and goods in and out of Gaza and an economic stronghold on the funding of civil services – have contributed to an economic and humanitarian crisis in Gaza not seen in the 38 years of Israeli control that preceded the withdrawal of permanent ground troops.⁶⁴

Likewise, John Dugard, a South African professor of international law and the UN's special rapporteur (designated investigator) on human rights in the Palestinian territories, stated in his January 2007 report: "Israel's laws and practices in the OPT [occupied Palestinian territories] certainly resemble aspects of apartheid ... In effect, following Israel's withdrawal, Gaza became a sealed-off, imprisoned and occupied territory.”⁶⁵ To make matters worse, the coastal territory was also caught in the crossfire, literally and figuratively, of the increasing tensions between Hamas and Mahmoud Abbas’s Fatah.

Ever since Hamas’s parliamentary victory, relations between the two Palestinian factions had been severely strained. In December 2006, roughly a year after the elections, the strains turned violent, with gun battles between the two occurring, mostly in Gaza. The intermittent skirmishes subsided in February 2007 when the two sides formalized a unity government agreement under the auspices of Saudi Arabia.⁶⁶ The Mecca Accord, as it is called, offered only a brief respite to the violence, and all to the chilly reception of the Quartet – the US, EU, UN, and Russia – and Israel. Nevertheless, the Palestinian coalition government quickly fell apart, with clashes resuming in Gaza that summer. In June the situation reached a climax when Hamas forces overpowered those of Fatah, and the Islamic organization took over and consolidated control of the territory. As a Hamas spokesman announced: “The era of justice and Islamic rule has arrived.”⁶⁷ (It should be noted that at this time the White House was involved in supplying arms and financial support to Fatah, the objective being for the latter to oust Hamas from the government. Therefore, Hamas’s action could be understood as a preemptive coup.)⁶⁸

Abbas immediately declared a state of emergency and dissolved the government, terminating Hamas official Ismail Haniyeh’s premiership and ending the four-month power-sharing agreement. Within days, Abbas swore in an emergency government, along with its new prime minister, Salam Fayyad, a move Hamas rejected as illegal. With Haniyeh and company officially removed from the picture, the United States and the European Union voiced immediate support for Abbas and Fatah, pledging a resumption of aid and a functional end to the boycott. Israel, too, released prisoners as well as tax revenue owed to the Palestinian Authority. Under these circumstances some see the political disunity – a Hamas-controlled Gaza and a Fatah-controlled West Bank – as a step further away from statehood. “This is the end of the Palestinian state, frankly,” Palestinian legislator Hanan Ashrawi lamented during the coup. “If you have two separate systems, there is no way that you can have a Palestinian state that is contiguous.”⁶⁹

From the moment Hamas took control of the Gaza Strip, Israel has, with American support and Egyptian cooperation, essentially sealed off the territory. On all sides, its inhabitants have been cut off from the outside world, with Israel severely restricting what and who goes in and out. This period, known as the “blockade” (June 2007–present), and its consequences for the Gazan people will be discussed later.

ANNAPOLIS, THE CARTER MISSION

Just prior to the Hamas takeover of Gaza, the Arab League reiterated the 2002 Saudi peace proposal, based on normalization of Arab–Israeli relations in exchange for the Jewish state’s withdrawal from the Palestinian territories and East Jerusalem.⁷⁰ Like its predecessor, the 2007 reissue was basically ignored by Washington and Europe. As mentioned, Middle East diplomacy during the Bush years was light. Yet, near the end of its second term, the administration convoked an international conference to address the Palestine–Israel conflict – though attempting to strengthen Abbas and Fatah over Hamas was probably among those goals central to the agenda. The meeting was held on November 27, 2007, in Annapolis, Maryland, at the United States Naval Academy, and was attended by over 40 countries and national organizations. “In furtherance of the goal of two states,” stated President Bush at the summit, “we agree to immediately launch good-faith, bilateral negotiations in order to conclude a peace treaty resolving all outstanding issues, including all core issues, without exception, as specified in previous agreements.”⁷¹ The Annapolis conference was ostensibly rebooting the Road Map, but instead produced short-lived talks that became hampered by Israeli settlement expansion⁷² and lack of American support – not unlike the 1991 Madrid Conference.

The following spring, Jimmy Carter went to the region on a peace mission in the interest of breaking the diplomatic deadlock, as well as to shine light on the Gaza blockade. Much to the dismay of the White House and Israeli leaders – who reiterated the Quartet demands, fearing any conferment of legitimacy on Hamas – the former president met with Hamas and Syrian officials during his trip. Carter, citing that even 64 percent of Israelis favored direct talks between Israel and Hamas, stated in a New York Times op-ed that “A counterproductive Washington policy in recent years has been to boycott and punish political factions or governments that refuse to accept United States mandates. This policy makes difficult the possibility that such leaders might moderate their policies.”⁷³ From his meetings with Hamas, Carter received promises including that the Islamist group “will accept any agreement negotiated” between Israel and the Palestinian Authority “provided it is approved either in a Palestinian referendum or by an elected government.”⁷⁴ But the Bush administration was never going to take advantage of any advancements made as a result of Carter’s mission. The White House’s position on Hamas was firm, which in turn iced over the diplomatic, political, and humanitarian situation in the Gaza Strip.

GAZA AND OPERATION CAST LEAD (2008)

Among the corollaries engendered in Gaza by Israeli disengagement – the blockade, international isolation, and the infighting between Hamas and Fatah – was increased terrorist rocket attacks. As stated, homemade rockets and mortars issued from the strip by Hamas-related groups and others since roughly 2005. Especially in early 2008 Qassam rockets showered areas around the territory, generally followed – or inspired – by IAF strikes against perpetrators and related facilities, frequently killing and wounding civilians. With the thousands of Qassams launched over the border into southern Israel, 19 civilians were killed in the June 2004 to January 2009 period, according to B’Tselem. Conversely, in 2007 alone, they report Israel killed approximately 300 Gazans, roughly a third of whom were not involved in hostilities. This cross-border violence culminated in a brief but lethal air and land assault on the strip in late February to early March 2008. Lasting only a few days, the operation claimed over 100 Palestinians, with half not involved in hostilities.⁷⁵ But this punishment would only be a harbinger of what would follow.

In the interim, Hamas pursued a ceasefire agreement with Israel, likely inspired in part by Jimmy Carter’s mission. Mediated by Egypt, a truce was finally agreed to in June. Hamas assented to keep its (and others’) rocket fire in check in exchange for Israel discontinuing strikes and targeted assassinations along with easing the blockade’s restrictions of commercial traffic. However, on election day in the United States, while Illinois senator Barack Obama was elected president, Israel broke the ceasefire. (Owing to Israel maintaining the blockade, some observers reasonably asserted the truce was already being breached.) The incursion pursued the destruction of an underground tunnel (one of many used by Gazans in response to the blockade, alleged by Israel for purposes of abduction), killing six Hamas gunmen in the process. The Israeli military said in a statement: “This was a pinpoint operation intended to prevent an immediate threat,” and that “[t]here is no intention to disrupt the ceasefire.”⁷⁶ The action, somewhat predictably, elicited barrages of rockets, though with little result. The six-month truce of June 19 expired on December 19, with back-and-forth attempts by both sides to get it back on track. On December 27, the Israeli military unleashed a full-scale assault on Gaza called Operation Cast Lead.

On the first day, the IAF assailed the territory with fighter jets and attack helicopters, killing approximately 200 people and wounding about 600.⁷⁷ After a week of near continuous air raids, the IDF commenced its ground invasion. An Israeli defense spokeswoman announced that the army had widened its target list from previous operations, stating, “Anything affiliated with Hamas is a legitimate target.”⁷⁸ That Hamas’s involvements in Gaza spread all through the territory – schools, mosques, hospitals – not just military matters, widened the target list to include virtually anything inside the strip, an area slightly larger than Grenada and slightly smaller than Barbados. Israel dropped leaflets as the ground invasion began, warning residents in a given area of approaching military operations, advising: “For your own safety, you are asked to leave the area immediately.” As the Washington Post observed, “It was unclear where the residents were supposed to go; Gaza is tiny, and no part of the strip, home to 1.5 million people, has been spared from attack during the past eight days.”⁷⁹ Outcry against the invasion resonated internationally, especially among Middle Eastern populations, though the European Union and the Arab states of Egypt, Jordan, and Saudi Arabia (all key regional US clients) were cautious in their language on account of Hamas’s relations with Iran and Syria.⁸⁰

The timing of the invasion was noteworthy. Carried out merely a month prior to Barack Obama assuming office, it is commonly inferred the incumbent Israeli leadership (mindful of their own elections approaching in February 2009) were looking to capitalize on the remaining carte blanche from the Bush White House.⁸¹ Obama was weeks away from his inauguration and presented a question mark, whereas Bush and company did not; throughout the invasion the administration laid responsibility for the situation exclusively at Hamas’s door. Moreover, it is likely Israel was looking for a definitive victory and to re-establish its credibility after the resistance it had met in 2006 during its attack on Lebanon and Hizballah.

After three weeks, on January 18, 2009, Israel unilaterally called a ceasefire and began its withdrawal from Gaza, leaving behind enormous destruction. The operation claimed the lives of over 1,400 Palestinians, more than 300 of whom were minors; less than 25 percent of the death toll were involved in hostilities against the IDF. From air, land, and sea, the Israeli military attacked and/or destroyed industrial facilities, food processing plants, farms, livestock, water and water-treatment facilities, UN locations and equipment, hospitals and various health facilities, mosques, a prison, and over 3,000 private homes. On the Israeli side, 13 were killed in all: four in southern Israel due to rockets, and nine soldiers involved in the operation (four by “friendly fire”).⁸² Apart from the consequences of Cast Lead, leaving Gaza in a state far worse than it was previously in, little concerning the bigger picture of the Palestine–Israel conflict was altered, save for a change in leadership in the United States and Israel, with Benjamin Netanyahu being re-elected prime minister.

BARACK OBAMA, DIPLOMACY REVIVED

After President Obama took office, the projected emphasis was on returning to the peace process. The White House early on sent its appointed special envoy, George Mitchell, to the region on repeated diplomatic missions in an effort to jumpstart negotiations. Also to this end, in June 2009 the president gave an address in Cairo that received worldwide attention and focused on a “partnership between America and Islam.” Among other points in the speech, Obama discussed the Palestine–Israel issue, reaffirming the two-state solution, the Road Map, the Quartet’s demands of Hamas, while condemning Israeli settlement expansion.⁸³

Settlements became (and remain) a major sticking point in US–Israeli–Palestinian diplomacy. The Obama administration repeatedly voiced its dismay on the subject, and the Palestinians demanded a halt to their construction as a prerequisite for negotiations. Benjamin Netanyahu, on the other hand, has maintained Israel’s 40-year policy with unabashed priority. And because of the prime minister’s blatant opposition on this major facet of the conflict, relations between the two leaders were tense. During a visit to Jerusalem by Vice President Joseph Biden in spring 2010, Israel announced plans to develop 1,600 housing units in East Jerusalem, a move deemed by the Oval Office as a diplomatic affront. As Secretary of State Hillary Clinton stated shortly after the incident, “The announcement of the settlements on the very day that the vice president was there was insulting.” What followed was a phone call from the secretary to Netanyahu, generally interpreted as a serious dressing down of the prime minister.⁸⁴

Regardless of Israeli inflexibility, Obama continued to express interest in negotiations, again deploying envoy Mitchell to that effect. In September 2010, the administration invited Netanyahu and President Mahmoud Abbas to Washington for the commencement of a series of one-year talks aimed at resolving the conflict. The initiative, however, was soon complicated with Israel’s insistence on continuing settlement expansion. Netanyahu ended a ten-month moratorium on settlement construction in the West Bank soon after Obama’s presentation of the one-year framework. Though the initial announcement of the moratorium (November 2009) was praised by the White House at the time, the so-called freeze on settlements was less than a freeze.⁸⁵ The New York Times reported that “an examination of the freeze after more than seven months suggests that it amounts to something less significant, at least on the ground. In many West Bank settlements, building is proceeding apace.”⁸⁶ Such lack of compromise only dampened the diplomatic atmosphere. After three months spent trying to induce Netanyahu to dedicate his office to the one-year talks, the White House discontinued the framework.

In February 2011, the Palestinian Authority, with the support of 120 (of 193) UN member states, submitted a resolution to the Security Council condemning Israeli settlement activity and “all other measures aimed at altering the demographic composition, character and status” of the West Bank. But irrespective of the resolution being consistent with repeated statements made by the president and secretary of state, the US administration vetoed the resolution, the only member of the council to do so. As grounds, the American ambassador to the UN cited possible harm to the peace process.⁸⁷

THE ARAB SPRING

In December 2010, a vegetable seller in the North African country of Tunisia was mistreated by the police and, in response, fatally set himself on fire. This incident is generally viewed as the stimulus that inspired a region-wide series of protests labeled the Arab Spring. The demonstrations affected just about every nation in North Africa and the Middle East, with countries such as Tunisia, Libya, and Egypt coming under new leadership; Syria, still engulfed in a vicious civil war (as of print time), could very well get added to the list. Though each country underwent a different narrative, the connecting thread was popular discontent and rejection of the status quo under leaders long hated and feared.

For those nations whose governments remained intact, the tables were turned, with leaders facing fears of their own, namely, ouster, possible prosecution, and even death in the case of Libya's Muammar Qaddafi. The situation in the Palestinian territories remained calmer, relative to its neighbors, but nevertheless experienced protests in Gaza and throughout the West Bank. These occurrences also took place on Israel's borders with Syria and Lebanon, eliciting violent reaction from the Israeli military and claiming dozens of lives and injuring hundreds. Among the dissent was the clarion call of Palestinians – Gazans and West Bankers alike – for an end to the divisions within Palestinian politics. Regardless of these demonstrations lacking the scale seen in Egypt, Hamas and Fatah (Mahmoud Abbas's party) sought to stave off a Cairo-like scenario.

In May 2011, the two factions signed an accord. "We announce to Palestinians," declared Abbas, "that we turn forever the black page of division."⁸⁸ Israel's response to the agreement was predictably negative on account of its rejection of Hamas.⁸⁹ The reaction from the White House was caution and a reiteration of the Quartet's demands. President Obama shortly thereafter delivered a speech reaffirming the two-state solution, emphasizing the 1967 borders, but expressing concern about Hamas as well as the Palestinian Authority's planned initiative to attain statehood at the United Nations. In the president's words: "For the Palestinians, efforts to delegitimize Israel will end in failure. Symbolic actions to isolate Israel at the United Nations in September won't create an independent state."⁹⁰

In the face of US rejection of the idea and financial threats by Israel (and Washington), Abbas nevertheless addressed the UN General Assembly on September 23, 2011. Standing before the international body he announced Palestine's desire for full UN membership. (According to polling, over 80 percent of Palestinians favored the initiative and roughly 70 percent of Israelis felt their government should support it.)⁹¹ The Palestinians were successful in gaining membership to the educational and cultural agency UNESCO, with the United States immediately withdrawing its funding of the agency in reproach. The Palestinian Authority did not, however, gain sufficient support in the Security Council for full membership, a vote which the United States had vowed to veto.

GAZA AND OPERATION PILLAR OF DEFENSE (2012)

On November 14, 2012, the Israeli Air Force conducted a targeted killing in Gaza against Hamas military commander Ahmed al-Jabari. Israel held Jabari responsible as a chief architect of terrorism in Gaza, though the attack confounded some due to Jabari's involvement in negotiations with Israel for a permanent truce agreement.⁹² Immediately following the assassination, Israel commenced Operation Pillar of Defense, an assault on Gaza that lasted eight days and was conducted exclusively via the air with tank support. The operation claimed the lives of 167 Palestinians (half were non-combatants) and six Israelis (four civilians due to rocket fire).

Israel's stated reason for Pillar of Defense was the 100-plus rockets recently fired out of Gaza into southern Israel. But much of the reportage and analysis at the time noted other possible calculations. Three bear mention here, presented in no particular order: First, elections were fast approaching in Israel. Benjamin Netanyahu would simply benefit from a muscular demonstration conducted in the name of security. Secondly, Israel's ire with regard to Iran's nuclear program was increasing. At the time, the White House was seeking diplomacy with Tehran in an effort to prevent Iran from developing a nuclear weapon. Given the lack of evidence of or stated interest in such a program, and the apparent interest of the Obama administration in warming relations with Tehran, a drop in regional prestige for Israel – as opposed to a nuclear Iran – was more likely the real source of Netanyahu's anxiety. In addition to openly contemplating an attack on Tehran's nuclear facilities, some conjectured that Pillar of Defense was simply a message for Iran; to this could be added an eagerness in depleting Hamas's weapons caches in the event of an Israeli attack on Iran, a supporter of Hamas. As the Israeli ambassador to the United States stated unambiguously, "Israel was not confronting Gaza, but Iran."⁹³ Thirdly, Hamas had been enjoying elevated status as of late, especially with its improved relations with Egypt, Qatar, and Turkey; and Israel would always be interested in knocking the Islamist organization down a peg. Regardless, however, of how the operation was calculated in the prime minister's office, the White House was kept in the loop, with the open channel of communication between Netanyahu and Obama being described in the Israeli press as a "showcase of American support."⁹⁴

On November 29, roughly a week after the ceasefire, the UN General Assembly voted to recognize Palestine as a "nonmember observer state," conferring upon it the same international status as the Vatican. While this would not make Palestine a sovereign nation with voting rights in the General Assembly, it would expand Palestine's benefits and access to international bodies such as the International Criminal Court. The vote at the 193-member General Assembly was 138 in favor and 41 abstaining. In addition to Israel and the United States, the only nations that voted against were: Canada, the Czech Republic, the Marshall Islands, Micronesia, Nauru, Panama, and Palau. Immediately following the vote, Israel announced a major expansion of settlement construction, including 3,000 new homes in the West Bank, and withheld more than $120 million in tax revenues collected for the Palestinian Authority.⁹⁵

JOHN KERRY, DIPLOMACY RESUMED

The beginning of 2013 started President Obama's second term in office, as well as a third term for Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu. Obama's new secretary of state, John Kerry, was keen to resume the diplomacy that broke down in 2010. In April, Kerry met with ministers from the Arab League to discuss revisions to the Saudi peace proposal issued in 2002 and re-issued in 2007. The original proposal offered a peace plan based on full Israeli withdrawal to the 1967 Green Line for full normalization of relations between the Arab world and Israel. In the meeting with Kerry, the league agreed to a modification of the plan allowing for the possibility of a “comparable and mutual agreed minor swap of the land.”⁹⁶ In other words, Israel could trade land it intended to keep in the West Bank, most likely for settlements, in a final peace agreement. Though not an innovation (much of the major peace process highlights, such as Camp David II, included this concept), Kerry had successfully brought the Arab League closer to the US–Israeli position as well as developed some momentum for further diplomacy.

It was not until summer, however, that Kerry gathered both sides around the negotiating table. The secretary held brief meetings in Washington DC with Israeli justice minister Tzipi Livni and Palestine’s chief negotiator, Saeb Erekat. It was agreed that talks would resume shortly, and proceed toward a nine-month deadline. Kerry and the negotiators also met briefly with President Obama, who voiced his support for the talks moving to final-status issues.

The negotiations were based on Israel releasing Palestinian prisoners, while the Palestinians promised to abstain from further application to various international agencies. Yet, the typical issue of Israeli settlement growth stressed the negotiations to the breaking point. In all, development on about 13,000 settlement units took place during the talks, evidence for the Palestinians of a “construction for prisoners” scheme. Upon Israel delaying the release of a batch of prisoners, the Palestinian Authority in defiance applied to 15 additional international agencies. After an announcement by Israel of 700 new housing units in East Jerusalem, Kerry made his now-famous “poof speech” in testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, airing his frustration with Netanyahu: “Poof, that was sort of the moment ... We find ourselves where we are.”⁹⁷

While Israel was “deeply disappointed” with these remarks, it was far more so with comments Kerry made later that month to the Trilateral Commission, a global discussion group. Emphasizing the importance of a two-state solution, Kerry remarked in the meeting that Israel ran the risk of becoming “an apartheid state” if the occupation did not give way to a Palestinian state.⁹⁸ The comment elicited outrage among some supporters of Israel for implicitly comparing the Jewish state to South Africa’s oppressive era of segregation. However, J Street, a pro-peace Jewish advocacy group, responded thus: “Instead of putting energy into attacking Secretary Kerry, those who are upset with the secretary’s use of the term should put their energy into opposing and changing the policies that are leading Israel down this road.”⁹⁹

After the April 29 deadline for the nine-month framework came and went, the diplomatic activity of the Obama administration came to a standstill, superseded by a summer of profound violence.

SUMMER 2014: UNITY, ABDUCTION, ESCALATION

Just after the Kerry-sponsored talks came to a halt, the Palestinian Authority announced on June 2 another unity agreement with Hamas and the creation of a transition government. The new government would be composed of “technocrats” and contain no members of Hamas. The White House and State Department adopted a cautious tone (as did Europe and Russia) – interpreted as support – while reaffirming the Quartet’s demands, which Mahmoud Abbas reiterated. (News reports indicated that the Obama administration even had some influence in the terms for the new government.)¹⁰⁰ At least on paper, Hamas was now basically out of the picture. The Israeli response, especially Benjamin Netanyahu's, was categorically negative.

Ten days later, three Israeli teenagers from a West Bank settlement were kidnapped and murdered. In its search for the teens, Israel sealed various West Bank towns and conducted early-morning raids throughout the territory. Hundreds of Palestinians were arrested, many of whom were members of Hamas, which Israel reflexively held responsible for the abductions.¹⁰¹ Due to evidence at the site of the kidnapping, and a government-issued gag order on the media, it was understood that Israeli intelligence was fully aware that the teens died just after being abducted – revealing the West Bank raids as being nothing more than a punitive exercise.

The Israeli military also extended this show of force to Gaza, where it conducted airstrikes against tunnels in the territory, killing a number of Hamas militants as well as civilians; this despite Hamas's adherence to the ceasefire terms agreed upon after Pillar of Defense in 2012. In response, Hamas and other Gazan militant groups began firing barrages of rockets into southern Israel and as far as Jerusalem and Tel Aviv. Israel then launched its third and most devastating assault on Gaza in five years.

GAZA AND OPERATION PROTECTIVE EDGE (2014)

Operation Protective Edge was initiated on July 7 and lasted until August 26. In the first day, the Israeli Air Force conducted airstrikes on over 200 sites in Gaza, with the stated intention of halting rocket fire, destroying Hamas's tunnels, and punishing Hamas in general. Among Israeli strategists, "mowing the lawn" became a popular metaphor in describing their country's policy toward Gaza, calling to mind also Cast Lead (2008) and Pillar of Defense (2012). Within the first week, the IAF carried out 1,300 airstrikes. Nine days into operations, Israel commenced a ground invasion of the territory.

Human rights groups denounced the operations, while the White House repeatedly upheld Israel's right to defend itself; at this point, and in light of the 2008 and 2012 assaults on Gaza, the manner in which events unfolded became somewhat scripted. News coverage and commentary tended to concentrate on the tunnels running beneath and the rockets emanating from Gaza. Israel destroyed 32 tunnels in all, with about two-thirds of those running inside Gaza. Rocket fire carried out by Hamas and other groups was stated as a principal Israeli concern, with roughly 4,000 projectiles (mostly homemade devices with poor or non-existent guidance systems) fired in all, killing four Israeli civilians in total.

According to an assessment report by the UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs (OCHA), "The scale of destruction, devastation and displacement wreaked in the 50 days of conflict that ensued is unprecedented in Gaza, since at least the start of the Israeli occupation in 1967."¹⁰² By the end of the operation, over 2,100 Gazans had been killed (1,473 civilians, including 501 children). Around 18,000 Palestinian homes had been demolished, leaving over 100,000 people homeless. Over 11,000 Palestinians, including 3,374 children, were injured. About 1,000 of those children injured ended up with permanent disabilities. Approximately 1,500 children were orphaned. On the Israeli side, the fatality toll was 71, of whom 66 were soldiers. Israelis injured numbered in the dozens.¹⁰³

Life in Gaza remains dire. Indeed, it was dire prior to summer 2014. With the continuation of the blockade since 2007, and the occupation since 1967 (from the outside since 2005), and following three military assaults in five years' time, the situation in the coastal territory continues to degenerate. The actions of 2008, 2012, and 2014, it bears underlining, were directed toward an occupied territory suffering crises in almost all domains of human life, which will be summarized in the Conclusion.

GUNS, CARS, AND KNIVES

The title of this section was taken from a headline in the British Independent newspaper, describing a wave of what have been single-person, unaffiliated (“lone wolf”) attacks that began occurring in Jerusalem and the West Bank shortly after Protective Edge.¹⁰⁴ The situation for many Palestinians throughout the West Bank and Gaza had become (and remains) stagnant and hopeless. The Arab Spring had come and gone. The so-called peace process had delivered nothing of the sort; in point of fact, from its very beginning in 1991, all the Palestinians had to show for the peace process was increased immobility, more checkpoints, more loss of land to settlement expansion, and a humanitarian crisis in Gaza. For West Bankers, Gaza was becoming a territory that felt like a different country. Likewise, Palestinians in the West Bank were even becoming disenfranchised from Palestinians in East Jerusalem, and vice versa. One might conceptually identify as a “Palestinian,” but in terms of day to day existence, one was a Gazan or an East Jerusalemite or someone from Hebron, Nablus, Bethlehem, and so on. The occupation has, in effect, separated Palestinian society into different spheres, each with sometimes a unique set of hardships. As a politically articulate bookseller in East Jerusalem put it, “There is no longer one occupation; there are now occupations.”¹⁰⁵ Furthermore, the leadership, whether in the form of the Palestinian Authority or Hamas, was providing little for its people, each faction typically preoccupied with its own wellbeing. The unity government lay in limbo, along with Palestine itself.

What sparked the outbreak of lone-wolf attacks was increased tensions at the religious sites in Jerusalem – not an unprecedented flashpoint. Fundamentalist Jewish groups and right-wing officials began campaigning for greater access to pray and worship near the Al-Aqsa Mosque compound in Jerusalem’s Old City. Increased Jewish/Israeli presence and influence near the mosque in turn raised suspicions and fears among Palestinians. For some, this was a last straw. As the uncle of a dead Palestinian assailant lamented, “Al-Aqsa is all we have left.”¹⁰⁶ By October 2015, attacks were becoming frequent, sometimes taking place daily, in the form of gunshots, stabbings, and vehicular rammings. After six months, over 200 stabbings had taken place, with 30 Israelis killed. Likewise, 200 Palestinians were killed, a little over half while carrying out the attacks.¹⁰⁷

Discussion and speculation as to a possible third intifada were widespread in the media. Some pondered whether this was, in itself, a kind of intifada. Regardless, by 2016, the frequency of attacks dropped, but continues as this goes to print, as does talk of a popular, broadly supported third intifada.

A “PARTING SHOT” AND THE KERRY PRINCIPLES

In the previous edition of this book, which came out at the end of Obama’s first term, this chapter closed with a block quote from the editorial page of the Financial Times.¹⁰⁸ The piece suggested the president “place a US plan before the Security Council” in the event of diplomatic “deadlock” concerning Palestine–Israel. Shortly after the electoral victory of Donald Trump during the 2016 US elections, former president Jimmy Carter wrote an op-ed piece in the New York Times sounding a similar note. The piece functioned as an open letter to Obama and called for the recognition of Palestine. “The Security Council should pass a resolution,” Carter urged, “laying out the parameters for resolving the conflict.”¹⁰⁹ The previous edition also stated the following:

Obama has made only rhetorical and symbolic gestures toward diplomacy and conflict resolution, producing nothing of substance. Despite not seeing eye to eye with [Israeli prime minister] Netanyahu, Israel has been allowed by the White House near total leeway in its management of the occupation. One notes the continuity with the prior administration.

This description also holds true for his second term. Indeed, with regard to the conflict, much of Obama’s presidency offered little contrast to the Bush II administration. Settlements expanded apace. The 2012 and 2014 attacks on Gaza were conducted with impunity. Not long before the 2016 elections, the United States finalized an unprecedented $38 billion military aid package to Israel (spread over ten years), presenting yet further evidence that certain protocols in the US–Israeli relationship reach beyond the interpersonal politics between the Oval Office and the prime minister’s. The Times observed that “the agreement follows one negotiated by George W. Bush.” And as noted by former Middle East diplomat and presidential adviser Dennis Ross, “If nothing else, it shows the basic American approach to Israel is, in fact, bipartisan.”¹¹⁰

In the eleventh hour, Obama decided to make a diplomatic move, albeit a unilateral one. At the UN, the United States abstained from a Security Council vote condemning Israeli settlement activity. On December 23, the council voted 14-0, with the US abstention enabling the adoption of Resolution 2334, to much applause in the packed chamber. The resolution reaffirmed that Israel’s development of settlements in the West Bank “has no legal validity,” and included a “demand that Israel immediately and completely cease all settlement activities...”¹¹¹ The American ambassador to the UN, in a statement after the vote, said, “The United States has been sending a message that the settlements must stop privately and publicly for nearly five decades.”¹¹² The news coverage, however, quickly took note of the atmospheric context with reference to Obama and Netanyahu – the abstention was referred to by Reuters as a “parting shot.” Regardless, the response from the Israeli leadership was predictably one of outrage and rejection.

Also adding to the context was President-elect Trump’s right-leaning statements and political appointments concerning Israel – as well as his direct meddling in US–Israeli affairs at the time of the vote – foreshadowing warmer ties with Netanyahu. Following the elections, Trump announced on Twitter: “As to the UN, things will be different after Jan 20.”

Five days after the Security Council abstention, Secretary of State John Kerry gave a speech at the State Department criticizing Netanyahu’s “rightwing” government, defending the US abstention, as well as elucidating the settlement issue and defending the two-state solution. In it, the secretary also laid out six principles which would serve as a basis for future negotiations. The Kerry principles are as follows: (1) secure borders based on the Green Line (allowing for land swaps) and a viable, contiguous Palestine; (2) two states for two peoples: “one Jewish and one Arab”; (3) “a just, agreed, fair and realistic solution to the Palestinian refugee issue,” including compensation; (4) “Jerusalem as the internationally recognized capital of the two states”; (5) satisfaction of Israel’s security needs, an end to the occupation, and a demilitarized Palestine; and (6) “End the conflict and all outstanding claims, enabling normalized relations and enhanced regional security for all as envisaged by the Arab Peace Initiative [Saudi peace proposal].” All in all, a general framework bearing considerable resemblance to the 2003 People’s Voice and Geneva Accords (see p. 180).

What effect UN 2334 will have on the ground remains to be seen as this book goes to print.¹¹³ What effect the Kerry principles will have are also unknown. And for that matter, the same can be said for what lies in store for the Palestine–Israel conflict, especially in the setting of a Trump White House. What does prevail and what is certain, however, are the harsh and desperate realities of an occupation now a half-century in the making: 1967–2017. Not quite thousands of years, but what must feel like it for those who suffer it.

Conclusion

Note: In the interest of keeping this conclusion compact, I have concentrated on a few central issues, the awareness of which is crucial to understanding the conflict: the demographic realities that are beginning to impact discussion of the conflict, what Israel is doing to preempt those realities, and what that preemption has spelled for the Gaza Strip.

DEMOGRAPHICS

Euphemistically referred to as the “demographic problem,” the disparity in the fertility rates between Israelis and Palestinians is now attracting commentary and analysis of the conflict. In addition to growing international disapproval of Israel’s occupation of Palestine, most significantly in Western Europe, is the uncomfortable reality of a minority occupying a majority. In other words, between the Jordan River and the Mediterranean Sea, Jews are becoming a minority population. According to the CIA’s World Factbook, Israel’s population growth rate is 1.56 percent, while the figure is 1.95 percent in the West Bank and 2.81 in Gaza.¹ The Jewish population in Israel is roughly 6 million (out of a total population of 8 million). Likewise, the combined population of the West Bank (2.78 million), Gaza (1.86 million), and Israeli Arabs (Palestinian/Arab citizens of Israel) is also approximately 6 million. Though equal at present, the growth rates tell the future. And in the short term, attempts are being made in Israel to mitigate this reality. For example, there are Israeli marriage laws disallowing those Palestinians who marry Israelis to move to Israel, as a control measure to ostensibly keep the country’s Arab population as low as possible. Israel is also seeking to pre-arrange an eventual Palestinian state.

CONVERGENCE

Since Israel’s redeployment from Gaza and the construction of a de facto border in the form of the West Bank separation wall, some view these efforts as an attempt to predetermine future negotiations. By proceeding unilaterally in the core diplomatic areas of borders and settlements, Israel is outwardly creating a “Palestinian state” of its own design. The term for this stratagem is “convergence” (or “realignment”), referring to a plan authored by former prime minister Ehud Olmert. This concept is not new, however, as a similar proposal was made in 1967 by Yigal Allon, a former labor minister.² The idea is to minimize the amount of land on which a Palestinian state will exist in the West Bank, hence the creation of “facts on the ground,” which will influence the outcome of any negotiations. These facts include: (1) the route of the West Bank wall; (2) settlement development east of (and within) East Jerusalem, especially the large and expanding Ma’ale Adumim settlement with its population of over 37,000 residents; and (3) the area northwest and southwest of Ma’ale Adumim slated for settlement development – referred to as the E1 area – which will cut further into the area east of Jerusalem. This narrows what will likely be the most difficult aspect of any final negotiations, namely, how much of the West Bank (Area C) will go to the Palestinians. The post-Camp David II diplomacy – Clinton Plan, Taba statement, People’s Voice, Geneva Accord – offers a reasonable approximation of what a final agreement might look like. With respect to the diplomatic particulars of settlements, refugees, and East Jerusalem, accord on these matters has basically already been achieved. Chances are, Area C will be the obstacle. Gaza, too, has been decided, though its short-term fate remains less so.

GAZA IN SUSPENSION

Life for those in the coastal strip has never been paradise. In the years prior to disengagement in 2005, reports on Gaza were already describing its desperate economic situation and the attendant effects of occupation, isolation, and the population’s immobility. Malnutrition levels were being compared to sub-Saharan Africa, with unemployment at over 50 percent, and nearly everyone relying, to some degree, on support from international aid agencies. All this in a territory the size of Las Vegas with the population density of Hong Kong. Sara Roy, a Gaza specialist from Harvard University, stated in an essay after the disengagement: “[Population] [d]ensity is not just a problem of people but of access to resources, especially labour markets. Without porous boundaries allowing workers access to jobs, something the Disengagement Plan not only does not address but in effect denies, the Strip will remain effectively a prison without any possibility of establishing a viable economy.”³

Especially since 2007, the strip has basically been sealed off from the outside world, creating a list of effects only worsened by operations Cast Lead (2008), Pillar of Defense (2012), and Protective Edge (2014). For instance, Gaza’s sole power plant operates at half-capacity, owing to damage by Israeli attacks and fuel shortages due to the blockade. Even with the purchase of electricity from Israel and Egypt, Gaza falls far short of its energy needs, by over 50 percent. Rolling blackouts occur across the territory, for sometimes 12–16 hours a day.⁴ The lack of power, along with deteriorating infrastructure, have also created a sewage crisis in Gaza. Summarized in a report by B’Tselem:

Sewage and wastewater treatment systems in Gaza are also deficient. Many residents are not even connected to the sewage system, and domestic waste flows into cesspits. The waste then seeps into groundwater, contaminating it. ... Some 90,000 cubic meters [24 million gallons] of untreated or partially treated wastewater flow daily into the Mediterranean, resulting in contamination, health hazards and damage to the fishing industry.⁵

Wastewater has also on occasion run through the streets in different parts of Gaza. The seepage of untreated sewage into the groundwater has rendered over 90 percent of the water in Gaza unfit for drinking. However, access to water is limited in the first place. According to B’Tselem: “Households receive running water for only six to eight hours at a time: 25% of households on a daily basis, 40% every other day, 20% once every three days, and the remaining 15% ... only one day out of four.”⁶

Another source of hardship has been the blockade’s control of import-export. Concerning basic goods, restrictions on what goods can be imported into the strip eased slightly in mid-2010 – announced by Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu prior to a White House visit. Israel had previously banned all but some vital humanitarian supplies and basic foodstuffs, but still blacklisted items that arouse curiosity, including cilantro, sage, jam, chocolate, french fries, dried fruit, fabrics, notebooks, empty flowerpots, and toys.⁷ After the easing of restrictions, only items deemed by Israel to be of potential military application (“dual use”) have been barred from import. While this allows many household goods, it bans numerous commercial and raw materials essential to construction and the operation of factories – some well outside what could be classed as dual-use, such as margarine.

In September 2007, Israel declared Gaza a hostile territory. In response, the UN’s director of operations in Gaza, John Ging, called the decision “a self-fulfilling prophecy.” “You designate it as a hostile entity, you treat it as a hostile entity and in fact what happens is you generate hostility,” Ging stated. “And that’s precisely what we have been witnessing here at the grassroots level for the last two and a half years under this illegal siege ... We have more extremism in Gaza every single day.”⁸

The pretext for establishing the blockade in the first place – to punish Hamas and cripple its ability to pose as a perceived security threat to Israel – has been called into question. Many human rights organizations have observed that the only punishment has been “collective.” Apropos this observation is an Israeli government document produced in a lawsuit with the domestic human rights organization Gisha. The document, substantiating the charge of collective punishment, states: “A country has the right to decide that it chooses not to engage in economic relations or to give economic assistance to the other party to the conflict, or that it wishes to operate using ‘economic warfare.’”⁹ Not occurring between two sovereign states on relatively equal footing, this economic warfare is taking place between occupier and occupied.

International concern over the territory’s fate has inspired various expressions of political activism. Specifically at the coastline, attempts have been made to relieve some of the impact of Gaza’s isolation. Since 2008, aid ships and flotillas have approached the Gazan coast with the intention of delivering aid as well as generating awareness of the situation. Groups such as the Free Gaza Movement have organized multiple voyages, with some successfully reaching Gazan ports. The most notorious expedition was endeavored on May 31, 2010, by a six-ship fleet embarking from Turkey called the Freedom Flotilla. The largest ship of the flotilla, the Mavi Marmara, was forcefully boarded upon its approach to Gaza by Israeli naval commandos in international waters, with the ensuing violence aboard the vessel claiming the lives of nine passengers. International condemnation rang out across the globe, with the Obama administration remaining detached, avoiding denunciation of the raid and tepidly “express[ing] deep regret at the loss of life.”¹⁰ An editorial by the Financial Times called the event a “brazen act of piracy.”¹¹

Appendices

1

Chronology

PART I

1.4 million years ago – 8500 BCE Paleolithic: Stone Age
8500–4300 BCE Neolithic: New Stone Age
4300–3300 BCE Chalcolithic: Copper Age
3300–1150 BCE Bronze Age: Age of Canaanite Kingdoms
1150–900 BCE Iron Age: United Kingdom of Israel; in 925 splits into Israel (north) and Judah (south)
925–720 BCE Israel
925–586 BCE Judah
900–609 BCE Assyrian Empire
612–539 BCE Neo-Babylonian Empire
539–332 BCE Persian Empire
330–67 BCE Hellenistic/Greek Empires
166–37 BCE Hasmonean dynasty
67 BCE – 330 CE Roman Empire
330–1453 CE Byzantine Empire
570–632 Life of Muhammad
600s–1200s Arab Empire
1095–1291 Crusades
1227 Genghis Khan dies, grandson Hulegu moves Mongols west into the Middle East
1299–1922 Ottoman Empire (1516–1918 Ottoman control over Palestine)

PART II

1882 First Aliyah
1894 Dreyfus Affair
1896 Theodor Herzl's The Jewish State published
1897 World Zionist Organization founded at Basel, Switzerland
1904 Second Aliyah
Aug. 1914 World War I begins
May 1916 Sykes–Picot Agreement
Nov. 1917 Balfour Declaration
Nov. 1918 end of World War I
Aug. 1919 King–Crane Commission
July 1922 Mandate system ratified by League of Nations
1933 Adolf Hitler sworn in as chancellor of Germany
1936–39 Arab Revolt
1937 Peel Commission suggests partition of Palestine
Sept. 1939 – Aug. 1945 World War II

PART III

June–Aug. 1947 UNSCOP visits and suggests partition of Palestine
Nov. 1947 UN General Assembly partitions Palestine

Dec. 1947 – May 14, 1948 Civil phase of Arab–Zionist war
May 14, 1948 State of Israel declares independence
May 15, 1948 – end of 1948 International phase of Arab–Zionist war
1956 Suez Crisis
1964 PLO forms
June 1967 Six-Day War
Nov. 1967 UN Security Council passes Resolution 242
Nov. 1967 – Aug. 1970 War of Attrition
Oct. 1973 Yom Kippur War
Sept. 1978 Camp David I (Carter, Sadat, Begin)
1982 Israeli invasion of Lebanon
Dec. 1987–1991 First Intifada
1988 Hamas forms
Jan.–Feb. 1991 First Gulf War
Oct. 1991 Madrid talks begin
Sept. 1993 Oslo Accord signed
Sept. 1995 Oslo II signed
July 2000 Camp David II (Clinton, Barak, Arafat)
Sept. 2000–2003 Second Intifada
April 2003 Road Map issued
Oct. 2003 Geneva Accords
Nov. 11, 2004 Yasser Arafat dies
Jan. 9, 2005 Mahmoud Abbas elected president of Palestinian Authority
Aug. 2005 Israeli disengagement from Gaza
Jan. 4, 2006 Ariel Sharon suffers stroke, replaced by Ehud Olmert
Jan. 25, 2006 Hamas electoral victory in Palestinian parliament
May 11, 2006 Prisoners' Document
June–Nov. 2006 Israel–Gaza conflict
July 12–Aug. 14, 2006 34-Day War
Feb. 8, 2007 Mecca Accord between Fatah and Hamas
June 2007 Hamas takeover in Gaza; Gaza blockade begins
Nov. 2007 Annapolis Conference
June 2008 Israel–Hamas truce (ends Dec. 19)
Dec. 27, 2008–Jan. 18, 2009 Israel's Operation Cast Lead
June 2009 Obama Cairo speech
Sept. 2009 Goldstone Report
May 31, 2010 Gaza flotilla raid
Dec. 2010 Arab Spring begins
Sept. 23, 2011 Palestine UN statehood bid
November 14, 2012 Israel launches Operation Pillar of Defense
November 29, 2012 UN recognizes Palestine as observer state
June 2, 2014 Fatah-Hamas reconciliation, form transition government
July 7, 2014 Israel launches Operation Protective Edge
June 26, 2015 Vatican recognizes state of Palestine
October 2015 Spate of stabbings in Jerusalem
December 23, 2016 UN Security Council adopts Res. 2334
December 28, 2016 John Kerry issues six-point peace plan

2

Israel's Prime Ministers

David Ben-Gurion (1948–54)
Moshe Sharett (1954–55)
David Ben-Gurion (1955–63)
Levi Eshkol (1963–69)
Golda Meir (1969–74)
Yitzhak Rabin (1974–77)
Menachem Begin (1977–83)
Yitzhak Shamir (1983–84)
Shimon Peres (1984–86)
Yitzhak Shamir (1986–92)
Yitzhak Rabin (1992–95)
Shimon Peres (1995–96)
Benjamin Netanyahu (1996–99)
Ehud Barak (1999–2001)
Ariel Sharon (2001–06)
Ehud Olmert (2006–09)
Benjamin Netanyahu (2009–present)

3

General Data: Israel, Palestine

ISRAEL

Population: 8,049,314

Note: Includes populations of the Golan Heights and East Jerusalem (July 2015 est.). Approximately 20,500 Israeli settlers live in the Golan Heights and 211,640 in East Jerusalem (2014).

Languages: Hebrew (official), Arabic used officially for Arab minority, English most commonly used foreign language

Religions: Jewish 75%, Muslim 17.5%, Christian 2%, Druze 1.6%, other 3.9% (2013 est.)

Area: 8,019 sq mi (20,770 sq km)

WEST BANK

Population: 2,785,366

Note: Represents Palestinian population only (July 2015 est.). Approximately 371,000 Israeli settlers live in the West Bank and 211,640 in East Jerusalem (2014).

Languages: Arabic, Hebrew (spoken by Israeli settlers and many Palestinians), English (widely understood)

Religions: Muslim 80–85% (predominantly Sunni), Jewish 12–14%, Christian 1–2.5% (mainly Greek Orthodox).

Area: 2,263 sq mi (5,860 sq km)

GAZA (THE “GAZA STRIP”)

Population: 1,869,055 (July 2015 est.)

Languages: Arabic, Hebrew (spoken by many Palestinians), English (widely understood)

Religions: Muslim 98–99% (predominantly Sunni), Christian <1.0%

Area: 139 sq mi (360 sq km)

Source: US Central Intelligence Agency: The World Factbook, <https://www.cia.gov/library/publications/resources/the-world-factbook/index.html>

Notes to the Text

NOTES TO THE INTRODUCTION

1. Encyclopaedia Britannica, 15th edn, s.v. "Middle East."
2. Ibid., s.v. "Arab."
3. "The Global Religious Landscape," Pew Research Center, December 18, 2012; "10 Countries with the Largest Muslim Populations, 2010 and 2050," Pew Research Center, April 2, 2015. For an informative reference on the Middle East, featuring maps, statistics, and visual aids, see Atlas of the Middle East, 2nd edn (Washington, DC: National Geographic, 2008).

NOTES TO CHAPTER 1

1. All biblical passages used in this chapter can be found in any study Bible.
2. One could debate endlessly the proper term to use: Israel, the Holy Land, the Southern Levant, the Eastern Mediterranean, Eretz-Israel, etc. Many scholars have dealt with the issue; I think Keith W. Whitelam, The Invention of Ancient Israel (London, New York: Routledge, 1996) handles it best and, though I cannot really claim to follow him to the letter here, I recommend reading his Chapter 2 before reading anything in the various subjects dealing with the history of the region.
3. In fact, the term "Canaan" makes its first appearance in an eighteenth-century BCE text from the site of Mari in Syria. For more, see Jo Ann Hackett, "Canaan," Oxford Encyclopedia of Archaeology in the Near East, Eric M. Meyers, ed. (New York: Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1997), vol. I, 408.
4. For one of the greatest twentieth-century archaeologists, and a true forefather to Syro-Palestinian archaeology, read anything by Albright and you are bound to find discussion on the biblical patriarchs and the Middle Bronze Age. While many of his ideas are now outdated some remain very influential.
5. Niels Peter Lemche, "Hapiru," in Meyers, Oxford Encyclopaedia, vol. III, 7.
6. Mentioned in Deuteronomy 33:2, Judges 5:4, and Habakkuk 3:3.
7. William F. Albright and John Bright are the two biggest proponents of the Conquest Model. See anything by Albright, and see John Bright, A History of Israel, 2nd edn (London: SCM, 1972). For the Peaceful Infiltration Model, see Albrecht Alt, Essays on Old Testament History and Religion (New York: Doubleday, 1968), particularly the essays, "The Settlement of the Israelites in Palestine" and "The Formation of the Israelite State in Palestine."
8. One of the earliest articles by Mendenhall: George E. Mendenhall, "The Hebrew Conquest of Palestine," Biblical Archaeologist, no. 25 (September 3, 1962): 66–87. For Gottwald's version of events, see Norman K. Gottwald, The Tribes of Yahweh: A Sociology of the Religion of Liberated Israel, 1250–1050 BCE (Maryknoll, NY: Orbis Books, 1979).
9. 2 Kings 17–18. Also the "Annals of Sargon," Ancient Near Eastern Texts: Relating to the Old Testament, James B. Pritchard, ed. (Princeton, NY: Princeton University Press, 1969), 284–5.
10. "Annals of Sargon," ibid., 284–5.
11. The name Israel disappears as a political and geographical term from then on. See Gösta W. Ahlström, The History of Ancient Palestine (Minneapolis, MN: Fortress Press, 1993), 690. There is some debate about what peoples Israel was repopulated with, but Miller and Hays are pretty reliable. See J. Maxwell Miller and John H. Hays, A History of Ancient Israel and Judah (Philadelphia, PA: Westminster Press, 1986), 39.
12. 2 Kings 18–19. Also the "Oriental Institute Prism," in Pritchard, Ancient Near Eastern Texts, 287.
13. Ezra 1:3.
14. Ahlström, History of Ancient Palestine, 822–3.
15. They crowned themselves kings of their region: Antigonus 306, Ptolemy 305/4, and Seleucus 305/4.

NOTES TO CHAPTER 2

1. Philip K. Hitti, History of the Arabs, 10th edn (London: Macmillan & Co. Ltd, 1970), 8. For my research in this area I used Hitti's major work, which I have cited here and throughout, but his shorter work, The Arabs: A Short History (1943; reprint, Washington, DC: Regnery Publishing, Inc., 1996), is very useful and features most of what I cover in this chapter.

2. Hitti, History of the Arabs, 21.
3. Encyclopaedia Britannica, 15th edn., s.v. "Arabia."
4. Hitti, History of the Arabs, 90.
5. Albert Hourani, A History of the Arab Peoples (New York: Warner Books, 1991), 13.
6. Arthur Goldschmidt Jr and Lawrence Davidson, A Concise History of the Middle East, 9th edn (Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 2009), 21.
7. Hitti, History of the Arabs, 93.
8. Ibid., 26.
9. Constantinople, as Emperor Constantine I called it, was located in modern-day Istanbul, Turkey. Before it was called Constantinople it was known as Byzantium. The Roman Empire would eventually split into East and West, and after Rome fell in 476, the Eastern Roman Empire carried on, and is referred to by historians as the Byzantine Empire.
10. The translation I have used is The Koran, trans. N. J. Dawood (1956; reprint, London: Penguin Classics, 1999). Also worth looking at is The Koran Interpreted, trans. A. J. Arberry (1955; reprint, New York: Touchstone, 1996).
11. W. Montgomery Watt, Muhammad: Prophet and Statesman (1961; reprint, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1974), 52. Readers might also consider Maxime Rodinson, Muhammad, trans. Anne Carter (1971; reprint, New York: The New Press, 2002); and Karen Armstrong, Muhammad: A Prophet for Our Time (New York: HarperOne, 2007). Two excellent documentaries I recommend on Islam and the Prophet are: the BBC three-part miniseries The Life of Muhammad (2011), and PBS's Islam: Empire of Faith (2000), narrated by actor Ben Kingsley.
12. It is not known as to whether these Jews were Arabs who had adopted Judaism as their chosen faith, or whether they were descended from Jewish refugees. It is, however, safe to assume that these clans were, in their look, manner, and lifestyle, more or less identical to the other clans in Yathrib. See Watt, Muhammad, 6, 84–5.
13. Ibid., 228.
14. Goldschmidt and Davidson, Concise History, 65. The term was coined by the historian Marshall Hodgson.
15. Hitti, History of the Arabs, 240. This quote is a classic in its own right and has been cited by a number of authors. Though I primarily used Goldschmidt and Hourani in this particular section, Hitti is very helpful with descriptions of what was going on culturally and intellectually during this period.
16. J. R. Hayes, ed., The Genius of Arab Civilization: Source of Renaissance, 2nd edn (Cambridge, MA: MIT Press, 1983), 6.

NOTES TO CHAPTER 3

1. Before their conversion to Islam, the Turks practiced a form of shamanism. The shaman, or mystic, was a medium between the natural and supernatural worlds, and practiced healing and divination.
2. Thomas H. Greer and Gavin Lewis, A Brief History of the Western World, 9th edn (Belmont, CA: Thomson Wadsworth, 2005), 281.
3. Arthur Goldschmidt Jr and Lawrence Davidson, A Concise History of the Middle East, 9th edn (Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 2009), 95. For a more detailed description of the Mongol invasions, and their subsequent empire, I found helpful and would suggest J. J. Saunders, The History of the Mongol Conquests (1971; reprint, Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 2001). For more detail on what is covered in the Goldschmidt quote, look at chapter 4 in Saunders, History, 54–61.
4. William L. Cleveland, A History of the Modern Middle East, 3rd edn (Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 2004), 48.
5. In addition to the above authors, see Encyclopaedia Britannica, 15th edn, s.v. "Crusades" and "Ottoman Empire."

NOTES TO CHAPTER 4

1. Theodor Herzl, The Jewish State (1946; reprint, New York: Dover Publications, 1988), 69.
2. David Vital, The Origins of Zionism (1975; reprint, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2001), 3.
3. Encyclopaedia Britannica, 15th edn, s.v. "Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen."
4. Howard M. Sachar, A History of Israel: From the Rise of Zionism to Our Time, 3rd edn (New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 2007), 4.
5. Vital, Origins of Zionism, 37–40.
6. Sachar, History of Israel, 8.
7. Quoted in Vital, Origins of Zionism, 52–3.
8. Sachar, History of Israel, 13.
9. Encyclopaedia Britannica, 15th edn, s.v. "Zion."
10. The acronym comes from the Hebrew: Beit Ya'akov lekhu ve-nelkha.
11. Herzl was aware of his work not being entirely unprecedented, though he was not versed in a good deal of the literature. During his writing of The Jewish State he was unfamiliar with the works of Pinkser (Autoemancipation), which he read immediately after, and Hess (Rome and Jerusalem), which he read two years later. Quite taken with both, he maintained that had he been more familiar with the literature he might not have undertaken his project in the first place.

12. Herzl, Jewish State, 69.
13. Ibid., 77.
14. Walter Laqueur and Barry Rubin, eds, The Israel–Arab Reader, 7th edn (New York: Penguin Books, 2008), 9–10.
15. Quoted in Vital, Origins of Zionism, 369.

NOTES TO CHAPTER 5

1. Encyclopaedia Britannica, 15th edn, s.v. “Palestine.”
2. Neville J. Mandel, The Arabs and Zionism Before World War I (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1976), xx.
3. Ibid., xxii.
4. Phrase used initially by Zionist leader and writer Israel Zangwill in 1901.
5. Justin McCarthy, The Population of Palestine: Population Statistics of the Late Ottoman Period and the Mandate (New York: Columbia University Press, 1990), 10.
6. The term “Sephardic” comes from the Hebrew Sefarad, meaning “Spain.” These Jews are descendants of the Jews from Spain who were expelled in 1492 and settled in North Africa and parts of the Ottoman Empire. The term “Ashkenazic” comes from the Hebrew Ashkenaz, meaning “Germany.” This group lived in the Rhineland and France until they moved east to Russia and Eastern Europe after the Crusades. Some would later move west again during the seventeenth century. Eighty percent of Jews today are Ashkenazic. The term “Mizrahi” (meaning “Eastern”; plural Mizrahim) is gaining frequency and simply refers to Jews from the Middle East and Asia in general.
7. Mandel, Arabs and Zionism, 29.
8. Quoted in Rashid Khalidi, Palestinian Identity: The Construction of Modern National Consciousness (New York: Columbia University Press, 1997), 101.
9. Howard M. Sachar, A History of Israel: From the Rise of Zionism to Our Time, 3rd edn (New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 2007), 73.
10. Mandel, Arabs and Zionism, 29. See also Benny Morris, Righteous Victims: A History of the Zionist–Arab Conflict, 1881–2001 (New York: Vintage Books, 2001), 46.
11. From the Basel Declaration quoted in Chapter 4.
12. Quoted in Khalidi, Palestinian Identity, 102.
13. Morris, Righteous Victims, 38.
14. Quoted in ibid., 36.
15. McCarthy, Population of Palestine, 10, 23–4, 26.

NOTES TO CHAPTER 6

1. Benny Morris, Righteous Victims: A History of the Zionist–Arab Conflict, 1881–2001 (New York: Vintage Books, 2001), 73.
2. Arthur Goldschmidt Jr and Lawrence Davidson, A Concise History of the Middle East, 9th edn (Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 2009), 205.
3. Walter Laqueur and Barry Rubin, eds, The Israel–Arab Reader, 7th edn (New York: Penguin Books, 2008), 11.
4. Ibid., 11.
5. Ibid., 16.
6. Quoted in Charles D. Smith, Palestine and the Arab–Israeli Conflict, 7th edn (Boston: Bedford/St Martin’s, 2010), 71. See also Morris, Righteous Victims, 74.
7. Quoted in Baylis Thomas, How Israel Was Won: A Concise History of the Arab–Israeli Conflict (Lanham, MD: Lexington Books, 1999), 12.
8. Quoted in ibid., 10.
9. T. E. Lawrence is an interesting historical figure, and the film Lawrence of Arabia (directed by David Lean, and one of this author’s favorites) is certainly worth seeing if you haven’t done so. Also, Lawrence’s account of his experiences in the Middle East, The Seven Pillars of Wisdom, is an enjoyable read to be sure. However, caution is advised when looking at these two works as actual history.
10. Doreen Ingrams, Palestine Papers, 1917–1922: Seeds of Conflict (New York: George Braziller, 1973), 20. See also Smith, Palestine, 73–4.
11. Encyclopaedia Britannica, 15th edn, s.v. “Fourteen Points.”
12. For the text of the Covenant of the League of Nations, see the Avalon Project at Yale Law School, http://avalon.law.yale.edu/20th_century/leagcov.asp.
13. Laqueur and Rubin, Israel–Arab Reader, 23–5.
14. Ingrams, Palestine Papers, 73.
15. For the text of the British Palestine Mandate, see the Avalon Project, http://avalon.law.yale.edu/20th_century/palmanda.asp.

16. For the text of the White Paper of 1922, see Laqueur and Rubin, Israel–Arab Reader, 25–9.
17. For text of the Peel Commission report, see the United Nations Information System on the Question of Palestine (UNISPAL), <https://unispal.un.org>.
18. Laqueur and Rubin, Israel–Arab Reader, 43.
19. For the text for the White Paper of 1939, see the Avalon Project, http://avalon.law.yale.edu/20th_century/brwh1939.asp; and Laqueur and Rubin, Israel–Arab Reader, 44–50.
20. A few titles on the subject one might find helpful: Raul Hilberg’s The Destruction of the European Jews (one-volume student edition) is an excellent history and is worth consulting; Hannah Arendt’s Eichmann in Jerusalem: A Report on the Banality of Evil covers not just the trial of a Nazi officer, but the history and themes surrounding the Jews, the Holocaust, and totalitarianism; Arthur Morse’s While Six Million Died: A Chronicle of American Apathy recounts the refusal of Franklin Roosevelt’s administration to adjust its immigration quotas and allow Jewish refugees sanctuary in the United States – an indifference that cost thousands of Jewish lives; another good text covering the same appalling topic is Henry L. Feingold’s The Politics of Rescue: The Roosevelt Administration and the Holocaust (the Morse and Feingold texts are out of print); Norman G. Finkelstein’s The Holocaust Industry is a devastating critique of how Jewish suffering under the Nazis has been, and continues to be, exploited by members of the Jewish financial and intellectual elite.
21. These groups were composed of individuals representing the most extreme and ultranationalist stripe of Zionism. The Irgun Zvai Leumi (Irgun, IZL, or Etzel for short), established in 1937, was the military branch of the rightwing Revisionists, a Zionist faction started by Vladimir Jabotinsky. Though also violently anti-Arab, the Irgun concentrated on London’s presence in Palestine, using terrorism and assassinations as means to oust the British. In 1943–48 the group was under the leadership of Menachem Begin, who would become prime minister of Israel in 1977. In 1946 the Irgun terrorists bombed a wing of the King David Hotel in Jerusalem, killing 91 (British, Arab, and Jewish). In 1940, the Irgun splinter faction LEHI (Hebrew acronym for the “Fighters for the Freedom of Israel”) emerged. Known early on as the Stern Gang (named after their founder, Abraham Stern), LEHI was a smaller group but even more extreme than Irgun. In 1944 members of LEHI assassinated Lord Moyne, a British minister of state, and in 1948 murdered Count Folke Bernadotte, a Swedish UN mediator working in Palestine.
22. Quoted in Smith, Palestine, 178–9.

NOTES TO CHAPTER 7

1. The countries involved in the Marshall Plan were: Austria, Belgium, Denmark, France, Greece, Iceland, Ireland, Italy, Luxembourg, The Netherlands, Norway, Portugal, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey, the United Kingdom, and West Germany.
2. Charles D. Smith, Palestine and the Arab–Israeli Conflict, 7th edn (Boston: Bedford/St Martin’s, 2010), 182.
3. The standard source for this oft-quoted remark is William A. Eddy, F.D.R. Meets Ibn Saud (1954; reprint, Vista, CA: Selwa Press, 2005), 35. A downloadable version is available at Selwa Press, www.selwapress.com/images/fdrmeets.pdf.
4. Ibid., 189. See also Benny Morris, Righteous Victims: A History of the Zionist–Arab Conflict, 1881–2001 (New York: Vintage Books, 2001), 180–1.
5. Morris, Righteous Victims, 181.
6. The UNSCOP team was composed of: Australia, Canada, Czechoslovakia, Guatemala, India, Iran, the Netherlands, Peru, Sweden, Uruguay, and Yugoslavia.
7. Walter Laqueur and Barry Rubin, eds, The Israel–Arab Reader, 7th edn (New York: Penguin Books, 2008), 67.
8. Ibid., 68.
9. Mark Tessler, A History of the Israeli–Palestinian Conflict, 2nd edn (Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 2009), 259.
10. J. C. Hurewitz, quoted in Christopher Sykes, Crossroads to Israel (Cleveland: The World Publishing Company, 1965), 325.
11. Quoted in Sykes, Crossroads, 346. See also Smith, Palestine, 194.
12. The six countries of China, Ethiopia, Greece, Haiti, Liberia, and the Philippines were recipients of this pressure. All except for Greece either voted in favor or abstained.
13. In favor: Australia, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, Byelorussian SSR [Belarus], Canada, Costa Rica, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, France, Guatemala, Haiti, Iceland, Liberia, Luxemburg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Nicaragua, Norway, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Sweden, Ukrainian SSR, Union of South Africa, USA, USSR, Uruguay, Venezuela. Against: Afghanistan, Cuba, Egypt, Greece, India, Iran, Iraq, Lebanon, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Turkey, and Yemen. Abstained: Argentina, Chile, China, Colombia, El Salvador, Ethiopia, Honduras, Mexico, United Kingdom, and Yugoslavia.
14. Justin McCarthy, The Population of Palestine: Population Statistics of the Late Ottoman Period and the Mandate (New York: Columbia University Press, 1990), 36.
15. Most accounts in the literature cite 254 dead. Cf. Morris, Righteous Victims, 209, who suggests that the number is closer to 100–110; and Smith, Palestine, 199, 211n67, who adjusted this figure from 250 to 115 in his fifth edition (2004). For

- general discussions of Deir Yassin, see Morris, Righteous Victims, 207–9; Smith, Palestine, 198–9; Sykes, Crossroads, 351–4; and Tessler, History, 291–4.
16. Smith, Palestine, 199.
 17. Laqueur and Rubin, Israel–Arab Reader, 82.
 18. Quoted in Sykes, Crossroads, 365. See also Laqueur and Rubin, Israel–Arab Reader, 81–3.
 19. Howard M. Sachar, A History of Israel: From the Rise of Zionism to Our Time, 3rd edn (New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 2007), 311.
 20. Calculations of troop strengths vary slightly, but a comparison of various sources can provide a reasonably accurate picture. See Morris, Righteous Victims, 215–18, who gives a fairly complete rundown of the militaries involved; cf. Simha Flapan, The Birth of Israel: Myths and Realities (New York: Pantheon Books, 1987), 193–7; and Eugene L. Rogan and Avi Shlaim, eds, The War for Palestine: Rewriting the History of 1948 (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001), 81. In Rogan and Shlaim, see Avi Shlaim’s “Israel and the Arab coalition in 1948,” 79–103.
 21. For a thorough elucidation of the March–April 1948 truce negotiations that preceded Israel’s statehood and the international war, see Flapan, Birth of Israel, 155–86.
 22. The UN Charter is available on the International Court of Justice’s site, www.icj-cij.org.
 23. Good general descriptions of King Abdullah’s involvement in the proceedings of 1947–48 can be found in Flapan, Birth of Israel, 126–30, 135–41; Sykes, Crossroads, 327–31; and Tessler, History, 275–8. The standard work on this subject, both detailed and scholarly, is Avi Shlaim, Collusion Across the Jordan: King Abdullah, the Zionist Movement, and the Partition of Palestine (New York: Columbia University Press, 1988).
 24. Sir John Bagot Glubb, A Soldier with the Arabs (New York: Harper & Brothers, 1957), 89.
 25. Flapan, Birth of Israel, 198–9.
 26. Tessler, History, 276.
 27. The scholar who has done the foremost research on the subject is Israeli historian Benny Morris. His The Birth of the Palestinian Refugee Problem Revisited (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2004), when it was originally published in 1988, laid to rest many disagreements and myths surrounding the refugee problem. Though this work is lengthy and a bit technical for the beginning reader, one might find useful both his concise discussion of the issue in his Righteous Victims, 252–8, and his chapter in Rogan and Shlaim, “Revisiting the Palestinian exodus of 1948,” 37–59. Cf. Flapan, Birth of Israel, 81–118.
 28. Morris, Righteous Victims, 252.
 29. Ibid., 257.
 30. Morris, Birth, 60.
 31. Disagreement hinges primarily on the issue of the Zionist/Israeli stratagem called Plan D (Dalet). The plan called for the expulsion of Palestinian Arabs living in the UN-designated Jewish state. Morris’s position is that “Plan D was not a political blueprint for ... expulsion” nor a “blanket instruction” for it (see Morris, Birth, 164–5). Israeli historian Ilan Pappé, however, maintains the plan existed as such and was given as an order. See Pappé’s The Ethnic Cleansing of Palestine (Oxford: Oneworld, 2006), preface and ch. 4. For further critique of Morris’s conclusions, see Norman G. Finkelstein’s third chapter, “‘Born of War, Not by Design’: Benny Morris’s ‘Happy Median’ Image,” in his Image and Reality of the Israel–Palestine Conflict, 2nd edn (London: Verso, 2003), 51–87. See also the Journal of Palestine Studies, XXI, no. 1 (Autumn 1991) for articles by Finkelstein, Palestinian scholar Nur Masalha, and Morris. Masalha’s piece is available, along with another essay by Morris, in Ilan Pappé, ed., The Israel/Palestine Question (London: Routledge, 2002).
 32. Flapan, Birth of Israel, 100; cf. Morris, Righteous Victims, 257.
 33. With the declassification of Israeli state documents, and a wealth of diary material available, the issue of transferring the indigenous Palestinian population out of Palestine – as a conscious Zionist thought and intention – has become increasingly visible. Helpful examinations of this issue can be found in the following texts: In chapter 2 of Birth, “The Idea of ‘Transfer’ in Zionist Thinking,” 39–64, Morris describes the discussion of the issue at the elite levels of Zionist leadership well before statehood; see also, Simha Flapan, Zionism and the Palestinians (New York: Barnes & Noble Books, 1979); and Nur Masalha, Expulsion of the Palestinians: The Concept of “Transfer” in Zionist Political Thought, 1882–1948 (Washington, DC: Institute for Palestine Studies, 1992). In addition to Finkelstein’s third chapter (cited in note 31), see chapter 4 in his Image and Reality, “Settlement, Not Conquest: Anita Shapira’s ‘Benign Intentions’ Myth,” for a critical analysis of Jewish/Zionist frames of mind and views toward Palestine.
 34. Raphael Patai, ed., The Complete Diaries of Theodor Herzl, trans. Harry Zohn (New York: Herzl Press and Thomas Yoseloff, 1960), vol. 1, 88. Cited in Morris, Birth, 41.
 35. Quoted in Morris, Birth, 48.
 36. Ibid., 60.
 37. Smith, Palestine, 229.
 38. Ibid., 238, 253n34; cf. Tessler, History, 344–5.
 39. Livia Rokach, Israel’s Sacred Terrorism, 3rd edn (Belmont, MA: AAUG Press, 1986), 39–40.
 40. Stephen Green, Taking Sides: America’s Secret Relations with a Militant Israel (New York: William Morrow and Company, Inc., 1984), 100–4. See also Rokach, Israel’s Sacred Terrorism, 38–41.
 41. Green, Taking Sides, 132–3.

42. Donald Neff, Warriors for Jerusalem: The Six Days That Changed the Middle East (New York: Linden Press/Simon & Schuster, 1984), 40–6.
43. In the general histories, see Ian J. Bickerton and Carla L. Klausner, A History of the Arab–Israeli Conflict, 6th edn (Upper Saddle River, NJ: Pearson Prentice Hall, 2010), chap. 6; Morris, Righteous Victims, 302–46; Nadav Safran, Israel: The Embattled Ally (Cambridge, MA: The Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1978), 381–413; and Smith, Palestine, 279–89, 300–6. Full, informative treatment of the Six-Day War can be found in Tom Segev, 1967: Israel, the War, and the Year That Transformed the Middle East, trans. Jessica Cohen (New York: Metropolitan Books, 2007), which is lengthy but readable. See also Donald Neff’s Warriors, cited above, and pertinent chapters in Green, Taking Sides.
44. For the attack on the USS Liberty I have mostly relied on Green, Taking Sides, 212–42; and Neff, Warriors, 248–60. The Liberty incident continues to attract attention; see John Crewdson, “New revelations in attack on American spy ship,” Chicago Tribune, October 2, 2007.
45. Morris, Righteous Victims, 336.
46. For descriptions of land clearing and eviction of Palestinians, see Morris, Righteous Victims, 336–43; and Neff, Warriors, 289–300.
47. Bickerton and Klausner, History, 149.
48. Excerpts of the Khartoum Summit are provided in Bickerton and Klausner, History, 153; the text in its entirety is provided at the Avalon Project at Yale Law School, http://avalon.law.yale.edu/20th_century/khartoum.asp. See also quote and discussion in Smith, Palestine, 303–4.
49. Arthur Goldschmidt Jr and Lawrence Davidson, A Concise History of the Middle East, 9th edn (Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 2009), 333.
50. Though printed in Laqueur and Rubin, Israel–Arab Reader, 116, see the United Nations Information System on the Question of Palestine (UNISPAL) site for a complete archive of UN activity regarding the Palestine–Israel conflict, <https://unispal.un.org>.

NOTES TO CHAPTER 8

1. All excerpts and quotes are from the Palestine National Charter (July 1968), which is printed in Walter Laqueur and Barry Rubin, eds, The Israel–Arab Reader, 7th edn (New York: Penguin Books, 2008), 117–21.
2. See Mark Tessler, A History of the Israeli–Palestinian Conflict, 2nd edn (Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 2009), 437–44.
3. For charts of the PLO’s organizational structure, see Ian J. Bickerton and Carla L. Klausner, A History of the Arab–Israeli Conflict, 6th edn (Upper Saddle River, NJ: Pearson Prentice Hall, 2010), 158–9; and Tessler, History, 431–2. A standard and useful study of the PLO is Helena Cobban, The Palestinian Liberation Organization: People, Power and Politics (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1984).
4. Benny Morris, Righteous Victims: A History of the Zionist–Arab Conflict, 1881–2001 (New York: Vintage Books, 2001), 347.
5. See Charles D. Smith, Palestine and the Arab–Israeli Conflict, 7th edn (Boston: Bedford/St Martin’s, 2010), 311; and Tessler, History, 449.
6. 10,000 Egyptians killed (military and civilian) compared to fewer than 400 Israeli deaths (military) are figures cited in Morris, Righteous Victims, 362.
7. A concise and well-documented analysis of Jarring’s 1971 mission can be found in Norman G. Finkelstein, Image and Reality of the Israel–Palestine Conflict, 2nd edn (London: Verso, 2003), 150–64. For discussion of the significance of Sadat’s 1971 peace offer, see Noam Chomsky, Fateful Triangle: The United States, Israel, and the Palestinians, rev. edn (Cambridge, MA: South End Press, 1999), 64–6.
8. Assistant Secretary of State Joseph Sisco, quoted in Morris, Righteous Victims, 389.
9. See Chomsky, Fateful Triangle, 66–7; Finkelstein, Image and Reality, 163–4; and Smith, Palestine, 312, 316–18.
10. Avi Shlaim, War and Peace in the Middle East (New York: Penguin Books, 1995), 47.
11. Suggested rationales for Kissinger’s hesitation vary slightly in the general histories. See Howard M. Sachar, A History of Israel: From the Rise of Zionism to Our Time, 3rd edn (New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 2007), 769; and Nadav Safran, Israel: The Embattled Ally (Cambridge, MA: The Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1978), 481–3. Cf. Smith, Palestine, 321; and Bickerton and Klausner, History, 168.
12. Laqueur and Rubin, Israel–Arab Reader, 152. See also United Nations Information System on the Question of Palestine (UNISPAL), <https://unispal.un.org>.
13. For excerpts from Begin’s electoral platform, see Laqueur and Rubin, Israel–Arab Reader, 206–7.
14. Tessler, History, 520–1, 910n115.
15. The Geneva Convention document is available online at the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights (OHCHR), www.ohchr.org. The Hague Convention text is provided by the Avalon Project at Yale Law School, http://avalon.law.yale.edu/20th_century/hague04.asp.
16. Smith, Palestine, 351–2.

17. Quotes from both communiqués came from Morris, Righteous Victims, 447–8.
18. The Camp David Frameworks are printed in Laqueur and Rubin, Israel–Arab Reader, 222–7.
19. Though I have relied on secondary sources for this section, it should be pointed out that most scholars refer heavily to the work of William B. Quandt, who was a staff member on the US National Security Council. See his Peace Process: American Diplomacy and the Arab–Israeli Conflict Since 1967, 3rd edn (Washington, DC: Brookings Institution, 2005). For full treatment of the 1978 talks at Camp David, see William B. Quandt, Camp David: Peacemaking and Politics (Washington, DC: Brookings Institution, 1986).
20. The Declaration at Rabat (October 28, 1974) is printed in Bickerton and Klausner, History, 175.
21. The full text of his speech can be found in Laqueur and Rubin, Israel–Arab Reader, 171–82, though the closing comment is not included; cf. T. G. Fraser, The Middle East, 1914–1979 (New York: St Martin’s Press, 1980), 136–40.
22. For text of UN General Assembly Resolutions 3236 (XXIX), and 3237 (XXIX), see UNISPAL, <http://domino.un.org/unispal.nsf>. Resolution 3236 is printed in Fraser, Middle East, 143–4.
23. The roll call was 72 in favor, 35 against, and 32 abstaining. For text of UN General Assembly Resolution 3379 (XXX), see UNISPAL.
24. Tessler, History, 567.
25. Ibid., 493.
26. Ibid., 906n71, cites 60,000–80,000 dead.
27. Smith, Palestine, 350.
28. Figures on the number of refugees are fairly consistent, most ranging between 100,000 and 200,000. Data on the death toll, however, vary widely. Compare the following texts: Chomsky, Fateful Triangle, 99; Morris, Righteous Victims, 501, 723n45; Smith, Palestine, 350; Sachar, History of Israel, 899; and Baylis Thomas, How Israel Was Won: A Concise History of the Arab–Israeli Conflict (Lanham, MD: Lexington Books, 1999), 219, 236n55.
29. For discussion of Israel’s plans for Lebanon, and for meetings held between Begin, Sharon, and the cabinet, see Ze’ev Schiff and Ehud Ya’ari, Israel’s Lebanon War, ed. and trans. Ina Friedman (New York: Simon & Schuster, 1984), 38–44, 45–61. Schiff and Ya’ari’s text is a standard work on the subject of the invasion of Lebanon. Being Israeli journalists, they were subjected to an Israeli military censor who excised portions of the manuscript before publication. Despite censorship, their text still provides the proper sense of atrocity. Another authoritative account can be found in Robert Fisk, Pity the Nation: The Abduction of Lebanon, 4th edn (New York: Thunder’s Mouth Press/Nation Books, 2002).
30. Schiff and Ya’ari, Israel’s Lebanon War, 43.
31. Ibid., 77.
32. See Chomsky, Fateful Triangle, 221–3; and Tessler, History, 576.
33. Schiff and Ya’ari, Israel’s Lebanon War, 225.
34. See Morris, Righteous Victims, 540–2.
35. Schiff and Ya’ari, Israel’s Lebanon War, 258.
36. The Israeli Kahan Commission cites 700–800 dead, while Lebanese estimates reach as high as 2,000. See Chomsky, Fateful Triangle, 369–70, 397–410; and Tessler, History, 919n125.
37. For examinations of Sabra and Shatila, see Chomsky, Fateful Triangle, 362–70; Schiff and Ya’ari, Israel’s Lebanon War, 50–85; and Tessler, History, 590–9. See also Morris, Righteous Victims, 541–7; and Sachar, History of Israel, 913–16.
38. For Reagan’s concern about a Soviet threat, see Smith, Palestine, 374; and Tessler, History, 629, 631.
39. Laqueur and Rubin, Israel–Arab Reader, 257–65.
40. Fred J. Khouri, The Arab–Israeli Dilemma, 3rd edn (Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 1985), 437.
41. Tessler, History, 584.
42. Laqueur and Rubin, Israel–Arab Reader, 298–9.
43. For events leading up to this round of violence, cf. Smith, Palestine, 397; and Tessler, History, 660–3.

NOTES TO CHAPTER 9

1. Don Peretz, Intifada: The Palestinian Uprising (Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1990), 4.
2. Baruch Kimmerling and Joel S. Migdal, The Palestinian People: A History (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2003), 297.
3. Mark Tessler, A History of the Israeli–Palestinian Conflict, 2nd edn (Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 2009), 694.
4. Charles D. Smith, Palestine and the Arab–Israeli Conflict, 7th edn (Boston: Bedford/St Martin’s, 2010), 399.
5. Peretz, Intifada, 9.
6. Ibid., 27; Tessler, History, 71.
7. Peretz, Intifada, 33; Tessler, History, 686.
8. PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat used this phrase in praising, and identifying himself with, the youth carrying out the Intifada.
9. Smith, Palestine, 408. See also Noam Chomsky, Fateful Triangle: The United States, Israel, and the Palestinians, rev. edn (Cambridge, MA: South End Press, 1999), 483.

10. Kimmerling and Migdal, Palestinian People, 292–3.
11. Hamas's name comes from the Arabic acronym for Harakat al-Muqawama al-Islamiyya, or Islamic Resistance Movement. The word hamas in Arabic also means "zeal" or "bravery."
12. David K. Shipler, Arab and Jew: Wounded Spirits in a Promised Land, rev. edn (New York: Penguin Books, 2002), 155–6. Cited in Peretz, Intifada, 104.
13. Excerpts from the Hamas Charter are printed in Walter Laqueur and Barry Rubin, eds, The Israel–Arab Reader, 7th ed. (New York: Penguin Books, 2008), 341–8. For the entire document, see the Avalon Project at Yale Law School, http://avalon.law.yale.edu/20th_century/hamas.asp.
14. This policy was announced by then Defense Minister Yitzhak Rabin. See Peretz, Intifada, 45; and Tessler, History, 699.
15. For text of UN General Assembly Resolution 43/21, see UN Information System on the Question of Palestine (UNISPAL), <https://unispal.un.org>. See also UN Security Council Resolution 605, passed shortly after the beginning of the Intifada on December 22, 1987.
16. Ian J. Bickerton and Carla L. Klausner, A History of the Arab–Israeli Conflict, 6th edn (Upper Saddle River, NJ: Pearson Prentice Hall, 2010), 225.
17. Benny Morris, Righteous Victims: A History of the Zionist–Arab Conflict, 1881–2001 (New York: Vintage Books, 2001), 596. See also Bickerton and Klausner, History, 225; and Tessler, History, 699–700, 703.
18. Laqueur and Rubin, Israel–Arab Reader, 354–8.
19. Ibid., 349–53.
20. Ibid., 359–62.
21. Avi Shlaim, War and Peace in the Middle East (New York: Penguin Books, 1995), 114.
22. See David R. Francis, "Economist tallies swelling cost of Israel to US," Christian Science Monitor, December 9, 2002, www.csmonitor.com/2002/1209/p16s01-wmgn.htm.
23. For text of the Oslo Declaration of Principles, see Laqueur and Rubin, Israel–Arab Reader, 413–22.
24. Avi Shlaim, "The Oslo Accord," Journal of Palestine Studies, XXIII, no. 3 (Spring 1994): 34.
25. Smith, Palestine, 434–5.
26. Cf. Shlaim, "The Oslo Accord," 34; and Tessler, History, 758.
27. Laqueur and Rubin, Israel–Arab Reader, 510.
28. Bickerton and Klausner, History, 273. See also Smith, Palestine, 445.
29. Bickerton and Klausner, History, 275.
30. Former Palestinian National Council member and professor of English literature Edward W. Said was a supporter of Palestinian rights and an outspoken critic of Oslo and Yasser Arafat, from whom he parted company during the accords. For his critique of Oslo, see Edward W. Said, Peace and Its Discontents: Essays on Palestine in the Middle East Peace Process (New York: Vintage Books, 1996). Madrid negotiators Hanan Ashrawi and Haidar Abdul Shafi also became outspoken critics. See interviews with Shafi in Journal of Palestine Studies, XXIII, no. 1 (Autumn 1993): 14; and XXXII, no. 1 (Autumn 2002): 28.
31. See Bickerton and Klausner, History, 279; and Morris, Righteous Victims, 639.
32. Quoted from the Guidelines of the Government of Israel, June 1996. See Israel Ministry of Foreign Affairs, www.mfa.gov.il.
33. Cf. Bickerton and Klausner, History, 284; Morris, Righteous Victims, 642; and Smith, Palestine, 455.
34. The text of the Protocol Concerning the Redeployment in Hebron is available on UNISPAL, though it is a non-UN document. It is also printed in the Journal of Palestine Studies, XXVI, no. 3 (Spring 1997): 131–9.
35. Israeli troops withdrew ("redeployed") from H1, but would remain in H2 as a security force to protect the settlers as well as handle conflicts between the settlers and the 20,000–30,000 Palestinians living in that sector. Palestinian jurisdiction in H1 would be the same as other Area A cities, while exercising Area B control over H2 where Arab matters were concerned.
36. The "Note for the Record" is printed in Laqueur and Rubin, Israel–Arab Reader, 522–3.
37. The General Assembly resolutions 51/223 (March 1997) and ES-10/2 (April 1997) are on the UNISPAL site. In both resolutions only the US and Israel voted against, with Micronesia joining the dissent in the April resolution. The votes went as follows: Res. 51/223 (Yes: 130; No: 2; Abstentions: 2; Non-Voting: 51); Res. ES-10/2 (Yes: 134; No: 3; Abstentions: 11; Non-Voting: 37).
38. The Wye River Memorandum is printed in Laqueur and Rubin, Israel–Arab Reader, 529–34.
39. The first two redeployments would transfer 1 percent from Area C to Area A, and 12 percent to Area B; 3 percent of the 12 percent would be designated as "Green Areas and/or Nature Reserves" where construction was forbidden. Additionally, 14.2 percent of Area B territory would become Area A.
40. The Sharm al-Sheikh Memorandum is available at the Avalon Project, http://avalon.law.yale.edu/21st_century/mid024.asp. See also Bickerton and Klausner, History, 331–2.
41. The May 2000 map was produced again at Camp David, showing, according to Charles Enderlin, Shattered Dreams: The Failure of the Peace Process in the Middle East, 1995–2002, trans. Susan Fairfield (New York: Other Press, 2003), 201–2, 76 percent. Cf. ibid., 148, 166; and Smith, Palestine, 483–5.
42. Regarding discussion of settlement blocks, see Enderlin, Shattered Dreams, 184, 188, and 213. For the division of the West Bank, see ibid., 166, 207–8, 226–7, and 249–50. See also Jeremy Pressman, "Visions in Collision: What Happened at Camp

- David and Taba?" International Security, 28, no. 2 (Fall 2003): 5–43.
43. Resolution 194, passed on December 11, 1948, states that the UN "Resolves that the refugees wishing to return to their homes and live at peace with their neighbours should be permitted to do so at the earliest practicable date, and that compensation should be paid for the property of those choosing not to return and for loss of or damage to property which, under principles of international law or in equity, should be made good by the Governments or authorities responsible." See UNISPAL.
 44. For discussion of the refugee issue, see Enderlin, Shattered Dreams, 196–9, 227–9.
 45. UNRWA's publications are available at www.unrwa.org.
 46. Enderlin, Shattered Dreams, 180. Enderlin's is an authoritative account and an important contribution to the literature on the subject. See also Clayton Swisher's highly valuable and corrective The Truth About Camp David: The Untold Story About the Collapse of the Middle East Peace Process (New York: Nation Books, 2004).
 47. Robert Malley and Hussein Agha, "Camp David: The Tragedy of Errors," New York Review of Books, August 9, 2001, www.nybooks.com/articles/14380.
 48. William B. Quandt, Peace Process: American Diplomacy and the Arab–Israeli Conflict Since 1967, 3rd edn (Washington, DC: Brookings Institution, 2005), 365.
 49. Malley and Agha, "Camp David: The Tragedy of Errors." In the September 20, 2001, issue of the New York Review of Books, special envoy and Camp David negotiator Dennis Ross responds to the Malley–Agha article, after which Malley and Agha respond in turn ("Camp David: An Exchange"), www.nybooks.com/articles/14529. See also the June 13, 2002, issue featuring Israeli historian Benny Morris's interview with Ehud Barak, and a response to the interview by Malley and Agha ("Camp David and After: An Exchange"). Both are available online at <http://www.nybooks.com/articles/15501> and www.nybooks.com/articles/15502, respectively.
 50. Quandt, Peace Process, 372.

NOTES TO CHAPTER 10

1. For reports covering the period of September 28 to December 2000, see "Illusions of Restraint: Human Rights Violations During the Events in the Occupied Territories, 29 September–2 December 2000," published in December 2000 by Israeli human rights organization B'Tselem, www.btselem.org. See also "Lethal Force: Israel's Use of Military Force Against Palestinian Demonstrators," published by Palestinian human rights organization LAW, www.law-society.org, and submitted to the Special Session of the UN Commission on Human Rights, October 2000.
2. For text of UN Security Council Resolution 1322 (October 7, 2000), see UN Information System on the Question of Palestine (hereafter UNISPAL), <https://unispal.un.org>.
3. See reports by B'Tselem and LAW; see also Amnesty International, Israel and the Occupied Territories: Excessive Use of Lethal Force, October 19, 2000 (AI index: MDE 15/041/2000), www.amnesty.org.
4. US Department of State, "Israel and the Occupied Territories," Country Reports on Human Rights Practices – 2000, February 23, 2001, www.state.gov/g/drl/rls/hrrpt/2000/nea/794.htm.
5. See Charles Enderlin, Shattered Dreams: The Failure of the Peace Process in the Middle East, 1995–2002, trans. Susan Fairfield (New York: Other Press, 2003), 313–17.
6. Ibid., 333–9; and William B. Quandt, Peace Process: American Diplomacy and the Arab–Israeli Conflict Since 1967, 3rd edn (Washington, DC: Brookings Institution, 2005), 375–7. Text of Clinton's speech is printed in Enderlin's discussion.
7. A forced controversy over this point continues, repeating the myth that Arafat brought a halt to the peace process by rejecting the Clinton parameters. For a recent example, see Martin Indyk, "For once, hope in the Middle East," New York Times, August 26, 2010, www.nytimes.com. (The former State Department negotiators Indyk, Dennis Ross, and Aaron Miller – today routinely quoted in the NYT – have been instrumental in perpetuating this fallacy.) The responsible literature tells a different story. See Yossi Beilin, The Path to Geneva: The Quest for a Permanent Agreement, 1996–2004 (New York: RDV Books, 2004), 52–3, 223–4; Enderlin, Shattered Dreams, 339–41, 344; Jeremy Pressman, "Visions in Collision: What Happened at Camp David and Taba?" International Security, 28, no. 2 (Fall 2003): 20; and Clayton E. Swisher, The Truth About Camp David: The Untold Story About the Collapse of the Middle East Peace Process (New York: Nation Books, 2004), 397–405. Clinton himself admitted both sides approved the parameters at a speech given to the Israel Policy Forum; see "Transcript of Clinton's remarks to the Israel Policy Forum gala," CNN, January 8, 2001. Curiously, he does not in his autobiography: Bill Clinton, My Life (New York: Vintage Books, 2005), 943–5.
8. Though not a UN document, the Taba Statement (January 27, 2001) text is available online at UNISPAL. A year later, the European Union special envoy Miguel Moratinos prepared a document summarizing and describing the negotiations at the Egyptian resort, which was published in Israel: Akiva Eldar, "'Moratinos Document': The peace that nearly was at Taba," Ha'aretz, February 14, 2002, www.haaretz.com. Present at the summit, along with his team, Moratinos interviewed and consulted negotiators on both sides. He released the document after presenting it to the Taba negotiators and gaining their approval of it.
9. All statistics regarding suicide bombing, extra-judicial killing, and home demolition are reported by B'Tselem. For detailed human rights reports on abuses both in Israel and the occupied territories, see the annual Human Rights Watch, World

- Report*, www.hrw.org; and the annual US Department of State, Country Reports on Human Rights Practices (especially 2001 through 2006), www.state.gov/g/drl/rls/hrrpt.
10. It might seem curious to some readers to make only limited mention of the 9/11 attacks. This event and the ones that followed – US attacks on Afghanistan and Iraq – actually have no direct bearing on our subject. Al-Qaida’s Osama bin Laden made mention of Palestinian suffering under American support of Israel in his rhetoric condemning the United States and the West. However, this invites analysis of bin Laden’s history and a broader consideration of US foreign policy in the Middle East. An excellent, though detailed, account of the bin Laden/ al-Qaida phenomenon is Jason Burke, Al-Qaeda: The True Story of Radical Islam (London: I. B. Tauris, 2004).
 11. Akiva Eldar, “The Arafat–bin Laden equation won’t stick,” Ha’aretz, September 24, 2001.
 12. The Security Council resolutions issued during this time were 1402, 1403, and 1405; see also General Assembly Resolution ES-10/10. All resolutions are available on UNISPAL. Quoted figures are from the “Report of the Secretary-General prepared pursuant to General Assembly resolution ES-10/10” (section III-E), available both on UNISPAL and the UN’s main site, www.un.org/peace/jenin/index.html.
 13. Figures reported by B’Tselem and attributed to the UN’s Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs (OCHA), January 2007.
 14. Israel Ministry of Defense, www.mission-ny.mod.gov.il. See also Israel Ministry of Foreign Affairs for more information on the barrier, <http://securityfence.mfa.gov.il>.
 15. The General Assembly resolutions ES-10/13 (October 27, 2003) and ES-10/14 (December 12, 2003) appear on the UNISPAL site. Resolution ES-10/14 is quoted.
 16. The International Court of Justice’s advisory decision (July 9, 2004) can be viewed on the ICJ’s site, www.icj-cij.org. See follow-up reportage and commentary in the Financial Times, July 10, 2004, www.ft.com/home/us. It should be noted that the only member of the 15-judge panel to vote against the decision was the American judge, Thomas Buergenthal.
 17. Alan Mairson, “Very Long Division,” National Geographic, January 2004.
 18. See Charles D. Smith, Palestine and the Arab–Israeli Conflict, 7th edn (Boston: Bedford/St Martin’s, 2010), 494–8. See also Nicole Gaouette’s series of articles, “Behind the barrier,” which appeared in the Christian Science Monitor and is available online at www.csmonitor.com/2003/0808/p01s05-wome.html.
 19. Aluf Benn and Yossi Verter, “A country that’s fun to live in,” Ha’aretz, March 10, 2006. See also Greg Myre, “Olmert outlines plans for Israel’s borders,” New York Times, March 10, 2006.
 20. Human Rights Watch, World Report 2007 (New York: Seven Stories Press), 478–9.
 21. The full text of the Sharm al-Sheikh Fact-Finding Committee Report is available online at the US State Department’s site, <https://2001-2009.state.gov/p/nea/rls/rpt/3060.htm>.
 22. For a review of Sharon’s settlement policies, see Daniel Williams, “Settlements expanding under Sharon,” Washington Post, May 31, 2002, www.washingtonpost.com.
 23. The text of President Bush’s June 2002 Rose Garden speech (“President Bush Calls for New Palestinian Leadership”) is available on the White House’s site, www.whitehouse.gov.
 24. “Bush calls for end to the Arafat era,” Ha’aretz, June 25, 2002.
 25. Ibid.
 26. See Smith, Palestine, 501.
 27. The full text of “A Performance-Based Roadmap to a Permanent Two-State Solution to the Israeli–Palestinian Conflict” is available on the State Department’s site, <https://2001-2009.state.gov/r/pa/prs/ps/2003/20062.htm>.
 28. The full texts of the speeches given by Bush, Sharon, and Abbas at the Aqaba Summit (June 4, 2004) are available on the Jerusalem Media & Communication Centre site, www.jmcc.org/documents/docs.html.
 29. Thomas L. Friedman, “An intriguing signal from the Saudi crown prince,” New York Times, February 17, 2002.
 30. “Arab summit adopts Saudi peace initiative,” CNN, March 28, 2002.
 31. For text of the People’s Voice (Hamifkad Haleumi) proposal, see Peace Now’s website, www.peacenow.org.il.
 32. Though not a UN document, the complete text of the 2003 Geneva Accord can be found on UNISPAL; the text is also printed in Beilin, Path to Geneva, appendix 5.
 33. Associated Press, “Poll: Most Israelis, Palestinians support Geneva Accord,” Ha’aretz, November 24, 2003.
 34. Glenn Kessler, “Bush says peace plan may be ‘productive,’” Washington Post, December 5, 2003.
 35. Beilin, Path to Geneva, 265.
 36. Steven Erlanger and Lawrence K. Altman, “Medical records say Arafat died from a stroke; poisoning unlikely,” New York Times, September 8, 2005; “France closes Yasser Arafat murder investigation with no charges brought,” Agent France-Presse, September 2, 2015.
 37. John Ward Anderson and Molly Moore, “Abbas declares victory in Palestinian elections,” Washington Post, January 10, 2005.
 38. For the full text of the Disengagement Plan, see “The disengagement plan of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon,” Ha’aretz, April 16, 2004. For the revised, unrecognized version released in June, see the Israeli Ministry of Foreign Affairs site, “The Cabinet Resolution Regarding the Disengagement Plan, Addendum A – Revised Disengagement Plan – Main Principles,” June 6, 2004, www.mfa.gov.il/mfa. See discussion and the text of both versions in Smith, Palestine, 527 (and documents 12.6 and 12.7).

39. Ari Shavit, "The big freeze," Ha'aretz, October 8, 2004.
40. Chris McGreal, "After Gaza, Sharon's next aim is ... do nothing," Guardian, August 26, 2005, www.guardian.co.uk.
41. Greg Myre, "Israel lowers its flag in the Gaza Strip," New York Times, September 12, 2005.
42. Human Rights Watch, "Israel: 'Disengagement' Will Not End Gaza Occupation," October 29, 2004.
43. Steven Erlanger, "Race for votes begins in Palestinian election," International Herald Tribune, January 3, 2006, www.iht.com.
44. Scott Wilson and Glenn Kessler, "U.S. funds enter fray in Palestinian elections; Bush administration uses USAID as invisible conduit," Washington Post, January 22, 2006; Scott Wilson and Glenn Kessler, "Palestinian candidates condemn U.S. program; events boosted government," Washington Post, January 23, 2006; Kim Murphy, " Hamas victory is built on social work," Los Angeles Times, March 2, 2006, www.latimes.com.
45. Harvey Morris, "Israel freezes transfer of Palestinian funds," Financial Times, February 19, 2006.
46. David R. Francis, "What aid cutoff to Hamas would mean," Christian Science Monitor, February 27, 2006.
47. Steven Erlanger, "U.S. and Israelis are said to talk of Hamas ouster," New York Times, February 14, 2006.
48. Steven Erlanger, "Aid to Palestinians rose despite an embargo," New York Times, March 21, 2007; Rory McCarthy, "EU refuses to lift boycott of Palestinian government," Guardian, April 27, 2007.
49. The text of the Quartet statement is available on the US Department of State's website: <https://2001-2009.state.gov/secretary/rm/2006/60073.htm>.
50. Receiving little treatment in the media, Hamas has indeed softened its more militant rhetoric captured in its 1988 charter, making frequent statements regarding the 1967 Green Line, for some an implicit recognition of Israel. As Palestinian then-prime minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas articulated in an op-ed piece in the Washington Post, the Palestinian "national conflict" is bound up in "statehood for the West Bank and Gaza, a capital in Arab East Jerusalem, and resolving the 1948 Palestinian refugee issue fairly, on the basis of international legitimacy and established law." In an earlier interview (also in the Post) Haniyeh, on the topic of recognition of Israel, responded: "If Israel declares that it will give the Palestinian people a state and give them back all their rights, then we are ready to recognize them." On the subject of previous obligations: "We will review all agreements and abide by those that are in the interest of the Palestinian people." See Ismail Haniyeh, "Aggression under false pretenses," Washington Post, July 11, 2006; Lally Weymouth, "We do not wish to throw them into the sea," Washington Post, February 26, 2006. See also Chris McGreal, "Hamas leader accuses west of hypocrisy over threat to withhold cash," Guardian, March 8, 2006; and Ismail Haniyeh, "A just peace or no peace," Guardian, March 31, 2006. More recently, see Natasha Mozgovaya, "Hamas leader: We will accept a Palestinian state within 1967 lines," Ha'aretz, January 8, 2009; Khaled Abu Toameh, "Hamas accepts Israel's right to exist," Jerusalem Post, January 21, 2010, www.jpost.com.

While some European nations, along with Russia, have made reserved contact with the Hamas-led government, the overall climate remains as it was in January 2006. Among the dissent over said climate, critical comment has been voiced by former Israeli security and intelligence elites regarding what they view as their government's use of the Quartet's demands as an "excuse not to negotiate." See Orly Halpern, "Experts question wisdom of boycotting Hamas," Forward, February 9, 2007; see also Dion Nissenbaum, "Ex-Mossad chief says Israel shouldn't wait for Hamas recognition," Knight Ridder, May 30, 2006. Sources attributed to Nadia Hijab, "Will the Quartet Recognize the Changed Palestinian Reality," Institute for Palestine Studies (policy note 12), February 16, 2007, www.palestine-studies.org; and Peace Now, Middle East Peace Reports, vol. 8, issue 15, February 12, 2007, www.peacenow.org.

51. Amos Harel and Avi Issacharoff, "Palestinian woman hurt in IAF strike delivers stillborn baby," Ha'aretz, June 24, 2006; Donald Macintyre, "Olmert: Israeli lives worth more than Palestinian ones," Independent, June 23, 2006.
52. For comment and documentation of the reportage that appeared regarding the two Gaza kidnappings, see Noam Chomsky and Gilbert Achcar, Perilous Power: The Middle East and U.S. Foreign Policy (Boulder, CO: Paradigm Publishers, 2007), 237-42, 265n29.
53. Figures reported by B'Tselem. As stated on their website:

Administrative detention is detention without charge or trial, authorized by administrative order rather than by judicial decree. It is allowed under international law, but, because of the serious injury to due process rights inherent in this measure and the obvious danger of abuse, international law has placed rigid restrictions on its application. Administrative detention is intended to prevent the danger posed to state security by a particular individual. However, Israel has never defined the criteria for what constitutes "state security."

Israel's use of administrative detention blatantly violates these restrictions. Over the years, Israel held Palestinians in prolonged detention without trying them and without informing them of the suspicions against them. While detainees may appeal the detention, neither they nor their attorneys are allowed to see the evidence. Israel has therefore made a charade out of the entire system of procedural safeguards in both domestic and international law regarding the right to liberty and due process.

54. Ilene R. Prusher and Nicholas Blanford, "Israel goes after both Hamas leaderships," Christian Science Monitor, June 30, 2006; Steven Erlanger, "Seizures show new Israel line against Hamas," New York Times, June 30, 2006.
55. B'Tselem, "683 people killed in the conflict in 2006," December 28, 2006. See also Amnesty International Report 2007, available online at <http://report2007.amnesty.org>.

56. Gilbert Achcar and Michel Warschawski, The 33-Day War: Israel's War on Hezbollah in Lebanon and its Consequences (Boulder, CO: Paradigm Publishers, 2007), 31–6.
57. Samar Assad, “A History of Israeli-Palestinian Prisoner Exchanges,” CounterPunch, July 14–17, 2006, www.counterpunch.org/assad07142006.html. See also Ze’ev Maoz, “Morality is not on our side,” Ha’aretz, July 25, 2006.
58. Roula Khalaf, “Hizbollah’s bold attack raises stakes in Middle East crisis,” Financial Times, July 12, 2006. This quote also appears in Chomsky and Achcar, Perilous Power, 241.
59. Warren Hoge, “Attacks qualify as war crimes, officials say,” New York Times, July 20, 2006.
60. Achcar and Warschawski, The 33-Day War, 32.
61. Amnesty International, “Israel/Lebanon: Deliberate destruction or ‘collateral damage’?” August 23, 2006 (AI index: MDE 18/007/2006); “Israel completes pullout from Southern Lebanon,” New York Times (Reuters), October 1, 2006; “Middle East crisis: Facts and figures,” BBC News, August 31, 2006, http://news.bbc.co.uk/2/hi/middle_east/5257128.stm. See also Amnesty International Report 2007.
62. Robin Wright, “Strikes are called part of broad strategy,” Washington Post, July 16, 2006; Seymour M. Hersh, “Watching Lebanon: Washington’s Interests in Israel’s War,” New Yorker, August 21, 2006, 28–33.
63. Hersh, “Watching Lebanon,” 29. Further evidence of this thinking is revealed in the US effort to delay an immediate ceasefire between the belligerent parties vis-à-vis the international community. Despite the massive destruction wrought by the Israeli military, the IDF was not faring as well as it had hoped. Hizballah, as discussed above, was proving a tougher adversary than had been assumed. As a result, more time was needed to complete what was turning out to be a daunting task. The White House, in turn, blocked discussion of the issue in the UN Security Council, reciting the mantra that “Israel has a right to defend itself,” with President Bush asserting that the war was “part of a larger struggle between the forces of freedom and the forces of terror in the Middle East.” But as Israel redoubled its efforts to defeat Hizballah, the more destruction was visited on Lebanon as a whole, thus increasing international condemnation to feverish levels. Washington, after roughly three weeks of imposing diplomatic paralysis on the matter, allowed the Security Council to pass Resolution 1701, formally ending the conflict on the morning of August 14. See David Stout, “Bush ties battle with Hezbollah to war on terror,” New York Times, July 31, 2006.
64. Sari Bashi and Kenneth Mann, “Disengaged Occupiers: The Legal Status of Gaza,” Gisha: Legal Center for Freedom of Movement, January 2007.
65. Rory McCarthy, “Occupied Gaza like apartheid South Africa, says UN report,” Guardian, February 23, 2007. For Dugard’s complete report, see John Dugard, “Report of the Special Rapporteur on the Situation of Human Rights in the Palestinian Territories Occupied since 1967” (advance edited version), UN Human Rights Council, January 29, 2007. For informative reports on the occupied territories, see The Humanitarian Monitor, published by the UN OCHA and available at www.ochaopt.org. Regarding Gaza, see also Sara Roy, “The Gaza Economy,” Palestine Center Information Brief (No. 143), October 2, 2006, www.thejerusalemfund.org; and Chris McGreal, “How can people live, I wonder?” Guardian, May 25, 2006.
66. See Walter Laqueur and Barry Rubin, eds, The Israel–Arab Reader, 7th edn (New York: Penguin Books, 2008), 614–21.
67. Harvey Morris, “Gaza falls to Hamas hardliners,” Financial Times, June 14, 2007.
68. For a valuable investigative analysis of this situation, see David Rose, “The Gaza Bombshell,” Vanity Fair, April 2008.
69. Joshua Mitnick, “Hamas nearly wins control of Gaza,” Christian Science Monitor, June 14, 2007.
70. See Avi Issacharoff, “Arab states unanimously approve Saudi peace initiative,” Ha’aretz, March 29, 2007; and Faiza Saleh Ambah, “Arabs call on Israel to take peace offer,” Washington Post, March 30, 2007.
71. “Text of Bush’s remarks at Annapolis conference,” New York Times, November 27, 2007.
72. See Donald Macintyre, “Angry start to Palestinian talks,” Independent, December 13, 2007; and Ilene R. Prusher, “Mideast talks already tangled a month after Annapolis summit,” Christian Science Monitor, December 27, 2007.
73. Jimmy Carter, “Pariah diplomacy,” New York Times, April 28, 2008.
74. Ibid.
75. “Israeli Gaza operation ‘not over,’” BBC News, March 3, 2008, http://news.bbc.co.uk/go/pr/fr/-/2/hi/middle_east/7274929.stm; “Rights Group: More than 50% of Gaza casualties weren’t militants,” Ha’aretz, March 3, 2008. Figures in both reports by B’Tselem.
76. Rory McCarthy, “Gaza truce broken as Israeli raid kills six Hamas gunmen,” Guardian, November 5, 2008. See also “Rockets fired after Gaza clashes,” BBC News, November 5, 2008.
77. Taghreed El-Khodary and Ethan Bronner, “Israeli Gaza strike kills more than 200,” New York Times, December 28, 2009; Joshua Mitnick and Charles Levinson, “Israeli strikes on Gaza kill scores,” Wall Street Journal, December 28, 2009, <http://online.wsj.com>.
78. Griff Witte and Sudarsan Raghavan, “‘All-out war’ declared on Hamas,” Washington Post, December 30, 2008.
79. Griff Witte, “Israeli troops move into Gaza,” Washington Post, January 3, 2009.
80. See Borzou Daragahi, “Diplomatic efforts to halt Gaza offensive make little progress,” Los Angeles Times, January 5, 2009.
81. See Scott Shane, “Israel strikes before an ally departs,” New York Times, January 5, 2009.
82. These general data and descriptions are taken from an extensive report mandated by and submitted to the United Nations Human Rights Council: “Report of the United Nations Fact Finding Mission on the Gaza Conflict” (A/HRC/12/48), September 15, 2009, www.ohchr.org. For cited data, see ch. VI, paras 336, 350–7, 362; and ch. XVII, para. 1238. The document is commonly known as the Goldstone Report. The research mission's leader, Richard J. Goldstone, is a former judge of the South African Constitutional Court and was the UN's chief prosecutor for war crimes in Yugoslavia and Rwanda. Though the report reviewed the behavior of both Israel and Hamas, suggesting each committed actions that could constitute war crimes and may amount to crimes against humanity, the bulk of the document addresses Israel's conduct. The Obama administration deemed the report unfair to Israel, instead choosing to emphasize Hamas's conduct. See "U.N. study is called unfair to Israel," New York Times, September 18, 2009. See also Richard Goldstone, "My mission – and motivation," Jerusalem Post, October 18, 2009. For a brief, informative, and carefully documented analysis of Gaza's experiences in recent years, see Norman G. Finkelstein, Method and Madness: The Hidden Story of Israel's Assaults on Gaza (New York: OR Books, 2014).

83. "Text: Obama's speech in Cairo," New York Times, June 4, 2009.
84. Glenn Kessler, "Clinton rebukes Israel over East Jerusalem plans, cites damage to bilateral ties," Washington Post, March 13, 2010.
85. The Washington Post noted the provisos:

Under the plan ... Israel would halt construction for 10 months, although 2,900 housing units – roughly the number that would have been built in that period – would be grandfathered in and completed. The plan also does not appear to include East Jerusalem, which Palestinians expect will be the capital of a future Palestinian state, and it would allow the continued construction in the West Bank of public buildings such as schools and synagogues.
- Glenn Kessler, "U.S. praises Netanyahu plan," Washington Post, November 26, 2009.
86. Ethan Bronner, "Despite settlement freeze, buildings rise," New York Times, July 14, 2010.
87. For text of resolution S/2011/24, see UNISPAL. For coverage, see "United States vetoes Security Council resolution on Israeli settlements," UN News Centre, February 18, 2011, www.un.org/news.
88. "Palestinian rivals Hamas and Fatah sign reconciliation deal," Guardian (Agencies), May 4, 2011.
89. Ethan Bronner and Isabel Kershner, "Fatah and Hamas announce outline of deal," New York Times, April 27, 2011.
90. "Obama's Mideast speech," New York Times, May 19, 2011.
91. "Poll: 70% of Israelis say Israel should accept UN decision," Jerusalem Post, September 21, 2011.
92. Nir Hasson, "Israeli peace activist: Hamas leader Jabari killed amid talks on long-term truce," Ha'aretz, November 15, 2012.
93. David E. Sanger and Thom Shankernov, "For Israel, Gaza conflict is test for an Iran confrontation," New York Times, November 22, 2012.
94. Barak Ravid, "During Gaza operation, Netanyahu and Obama finally learned to work together," Ha'aretz, November 26, 2012.
95. Harriet Sherwood, "Israel seizes $120m in Palestinian tax revenue over UN vote," Guardian, December 2, 2012.
96. Steven Lee Myers and Jodi Rudoren, "Kerry calls Arab League plan to revive talks with Israel a 'big step,'" New York Times, April 30, 2013.
97. Mark Landler, "Mideast frustration, the sequel," New York Times, April 8, 2014. This was not the first time Kerry had vented his frustrations with Netanyahu; see Michael R. Gordon and Isabel Kershner, "Israel halts prisoner release as talks hit impasse," New York Times, April 3, 2014. See also Nahum Barnea, "Inside the talks' failure: US officials open up," Ynet, May 2, 2014, www.ynetnews.com. Barnea's piece is an anonymous interview with "senior American officials" close to Kerry's Palestine-Israel diplomacy, revealing the US position that Netanyahu was primarily at fault for the talks' failure.
98. Josh Rogin, "Exclusive: Kerry warns Israel could become 'an apartheid state,'" Daily Beast, April 27, 2014.
99. Michael R. Gordon, "Kerry expresses regret after apartheid remark," New York Times, April 28, 2014.
100. William Booth and Anne Gearan, "Palestinians form new unity government that includes Hamas," Washington Post, June 2, 2014.
101. Those involved were likely part of a "lone cell" operating in the West Bank and affiliated with Hamas. One Hamas member based in Turkey claimed credit for Hamas involvement in the abduction. Yet, doubt persists as to whether upper-echelon Hamas officials actually handed down instructions. See online blog piece on New York magazine's site by Katie Zavadski, "It turns out Hamas may not have kidnapped and killed the 3 Israeli teens after all," July 25, 2014 [updated]; and Orlando Crowcroft, "Hamas official: we were behind the kidnapping of three Israeli teenagers," Guardian, September 21, 2014.
102. "Gaza: Initial Rapid Assessment," UN OCHA, August 27, 2014, www.ochaopt.org.
103. "Occupied Palestinian Territory: Gaza Emergency Situation Report," UN OCHA, September 4, 2014, <https://www.ochaopt.org/reports/situation-reports>.
104. Ben Lynfield, "Israel attacks: Guns, cars and knives are the new weapons of war in Jerusalem," Independent, October 13, 2015.
105. Discussion with author.
106. William Booth and Ruth Eglash, "What drives the Palestinians who attack Jews with kitchen knives?" Washington Post, October 20, 2015.
107. Peter Beaumont, "Israel-Palestine: outlook bleak as wave of violence passes six-month mark" Guardian, March 31, 2016.
108. "Once more into the Mideast breach," Financial Times, April 30, 2010.

109. Jimmy Carter, "America must recognize Palestine," New York Times, November 28, 2016.
110. Peter Baker and Julie Hirschfeld Davis, "U.S. finalizes deal to give Israel $38 billion in military aid," New York Times, September 13, 2016.
111. Text of UN 2334 available on the UN's site: www.un.org/en/sc/documents/resolutions.
112. Peter Beaumont, "US abstention allows UN to demand end to Israeli settlements," Guardian, December 23, 2016.
113. For a clear analysis of the resolution, see Barak Ravid, "Understanding the UN resolution on Israeli settlements: what are the immediate ramifications?" Ha'aretz, December 24, 2016.

NOTES TO CONCLUSION

1. US Central Intelligence Agency, The World Factbook, <https://www.cia.gov/library/publications/resources/the-world-factbook/index.html>.
2. For the convergence plan, see Greg Myre, "Olmert outlines plans for Israel's borders," New York Times, March 10, 2006; and Karby Leggett, "Olmert to call for global support of Israel's West Bank pullout plan," Wall Street Journal, April 12, 2006, <http://online.wsj.com>. For the Allon Plan, see Avi Shlaim, The Iron Wall: Israel and the Arab World (New York: W. W. Norton, 2001), 256–8, 262–4.
3. Sara Roy, "A Dubai on the Mediterranean," London Review of Books, November 3, 2005. A similar piece by Roy – "Praying with Their Eyes Closed" – along with an analysis of the Disengagement Plan by Geoffrey Aronson (which she refers to in both articles), can be found in Journal of Palestine Studies, 34, no. 4 (Summer 2005): 64–74, 49–63.
4. See "The humanitarian impact of Gaza's electricity and fuel crisis," UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs (OCHA), July 2015, www.ochaopt.org. This reality continues into 2016: "Severe power cuts in Gaza," OCHA, June 3, 2016.
5. "Water crisis in Gaza Strip: Over 90% of water un-potable," B'Tselem, February 6, 2014, www.btselem.org.
6. Ibid.
7. Amira Hass, "Why won't Israel allow Gazans to import coriander?" Ha'aretz, May 7, 2010, www.haaretz.com.
8. Harriet Sherwood, "Childhood in ruins," Guardian, December 17, 2009.
9. Sheera Frenkel, "Israeli document: Gaza blockade isn't about security," McClatchy, June 9, 2010, www.mcclatchydc.com.
10. "Obama withholds condemnation of Gaza flotilla clashes, calls for clarification of 'facts,'" Ha'aretz, May 31, 2010.
11. "Israel is lost at sea," Financial Times, May 31, 2010, www.ft.com.

Suggested Reading

I. GENERAL HISTORIES OF THE PALESTINE–ISRAEL CONFLICT

Presented in increasing level of detail:

Martin Bunton, The Israeli–Palestinian Conflict: A Very Short Introduction (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2013), is a primer that beginners should find helpful; T. G. Fraser, The Arab–Israeli Conflict, 3rd edn (New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2007), is a focused introduction starting with World War I; Kirsten E. Schulze, The Arab–Israeli Conflict, 3rd edn (New York: Routledge, 2017), like Fraser’s, begins at World War I and suitably covers the basics; Stewart Ross, The Israeli–Palestinian Conflict (Columbus, OH: McGraw-Hill, 2007), is an able primer from the Teach Yourself series. See also Phyllis Bennis, Understanding the Palestinian–Israeli Conflict: A Primer, rev. edn (Northampton, MA: Interlink/Olive Branch Press, 2015), a handy Q&A discussion of the key issues by a knowledgeable scholar.

Two texts roughly comparable to this one in size and detail are Alan Dowty, Israel/Palestine, 3rd edn (Cambridge, UK: Polity Press, 2012); and James L. Gelvin, The Israel–Palestine Conflict: One Hundred Years of War, 3rd edn (New York: Cambridge University Press, 2014). The former looks closely at polling data and perceptions, the latter at the subject of nationalism.

Two fully developed histories, frequently used as textbooks, are Ian J. Bickerton and Carla L. Klausner, A History of the Arab–Israeli Conflict, 7th edn (New York: Pearson, 2015); and Charles D. Smith, Palestine and the Arab–Israeli Conflict, 9th edn (Boston: Bedford/St. Martin’s, 2017). Both texts are readable, well organized, and feature source documents. See also David W. Lesch, The Arab–Israeli Conflict: A History (New York: Oxford University Press, 2008).

I would follow Bickerton–Klausner, Smith, and Lesch with: Benny Morris, Righteous Victims: A History of the Zionist–Arab Conflict, 1881–2001 (New York: Vintage Books, 2001); Avi Shlaim, The Iron Wall: Israel and the Arab World, rev. edn (New York: W. W. Norton, 2014); and Mark Tessler, A History of the Israeli–Palestinian Conflict, 2nd edn (Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 2009). Shlaim’s is a valuable account of Israeli–Arab relations. The Morris and Tessler texts are both hefty (over 700 pages), with Morris focusing more on military concerns and Tessler on the political.

II. GENERAL MIDDLE EASTERN HISTORY

Arthur Goldschmidt Jr and Aomar Boum, A Concise History of the Middle East, 11th edn (Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 2015), is excellent, clear, and commonly used as a text for undergraduates. William L. Cleveland and Martin Bunton, A History of the Modern Middle East, 5th edn (Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 2012), is another standard survey; with the Goldschmidt and Cleveland volumes on your desk, you're in good hands. Others I recommend: James L. Gelvin, The Modern Middle East: A History, 3rd edn (New York: Oxford University Press, 2011); and Mehran Kamrava, The Modern Middle East: A Political History since the First World War, 3rd edn (Los Angeles: University of California Press, 2013). See also Eugene Rogan, The Arabs: A History (New York: Basic Books, 2009).

Two brief examinations of the modern Middle East and Western influence over the region I frequently suggest are: Avi Shlaim, War and Peace in the Middle East (New York: Penguin Books, 1995); and Rashid Khalidi, Resurrecting Empire: Western Footprints and America's Perilous Path in the Middle East (Boston, MA: Beacon Press, 2005), which dedicates a fair amount of attention to Palestine–Israel. See also my It's Not about Religion (Santa Monica: Perceval Press, 2012), which examines Western intervention in the Middle East while addressing the question of religion.

III. PERIODICALS

With regard to journals, the quarterly Journal of Palestine Studies is a standard and excellent resource. Also valuable are the quarterly Middle East Journal and the Middle East Report. See also the Washington Report (nine annual issues). Two bimonthly “establishment” journals (meaning the contributors are influential in the realm of policy) that are both informative and revealing are Foreign Affairs and Foreign Policy.

Quality American print dailies are in short supply. Of course, the New York Times is a standard source and is well worth monitoring, but it should be kept in mind that its reportage is consistent with the paper's protective attitude toward US policy. Among the best American papers is the Christian Science Monitor, which despite its name is a secular paper that features solid journalism. British papers, on the other hand, commonly offer better reporting; I highly recommend the Independent and the Guardian. For news about the conflict, Israel's daily Ha'aretz is essential reading. All these papers are available online.

IV. INTERNET RESOURCES

For American audiences, the major network and cable news outlets in the United States have played a key role in bewildering the public. They seek to protect US foreign policy interests at the expense of doing journalism, and caution is advised when watching their coverage. While no news organization is perfect, the lists below feature sources that attempt to be serious and inform their audiences. (For those seeking a short online news route, one can stay reasonably well informed on the Middle East by simply reading the Guardian and Al Jazeera.)

News

Al Jazeera English (Qatar): www.aljazeera.com

Christian Science Monitor (US): www.csmonitor.com

Democracy Now (US): www.democracynow.org

Guardian (UK): www.guardian.co.uk

Ha'aretz (Israel): www.haaretz.com

Independent (UK): www.independent.co.uk

Jerusalem Post (Israel): www.jpost.com

Palestine Chronicle (US): www.palestinechronicle.com

Yedioth Ahronot/Ynet News (Israel): www.ynetnews.com

Analysis, Commentary

AJ+ (YouTube channel): www.youtube.com/ajplus

Al Monitor: www.al-monitor.com

Electronic Intifada: www.electronicintifada.net

Foundation for Middle East Peace: www.fmep.org

Informed Comment (Juan Cole's blog): www.juancole.com

Institute for Middle East Understanding: www.imeu.net

Institute for Palestine Studies: www.palestine-studies.org

Middle East Institute: www.mideasti.org

Middle East Research and Information Project: www.merip.org

Mondoweiss: www.mondoweiss.net

Worldview, on Chicago Public Radio: www.wbez.org/worldview

Human Rights

Amnesty International: www.amnesty.org

B'Tselem (Israel): www.btselem.org

Gisha (Israel): www.gisha.org

Human Rights Watch: www.hrw.org

Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs (OCHA, UN): www.ochaopt.org

United Nations Relief and Works Agency (UNRWA): www.unrwa.org

Miscellaneous

Avalon Project (Yale Law School, document archive): www.avalon.law.yale.edu

CIA Factbook: <https://www.cia.gov/library/publications/resources/the-world-factbook/index.html>

UN Information System on the Question of Palestine (UNISPAL): <https://unispal.un.org>

Select Bibliography

- Achcar, Gilbert, and Michel Warschawski. The 33-Day War: Israel's War on Hezbollah in Lebanon and its Consequences. Boulder, CO: Paradigm Publishers, 2007.
- Aruri, Naseer H. Dishonest Broker: The US Role in Israel and Palestine. Cambridge, MA: South End Press, 2003.
- Beatty, Ilene. Arab and Jew in the Land of Canaan. Chicago: Henry Regnery Company, 1957.
- Benvenisti, Meron. The West Bank Data Project: A Survey of Israel's Policies. Washington, DC: The American Enterprise Institute, 1984.
- Bickerton, Ian J., and Carla L. Klausner. A History of the Arab-Israeli Conflict. 6th edn. Upper Saddle River, NJ: Pearson Prentice Hall, 2010.
- Carey, Roane, ed. The New Intifada: Resisting Israel's Apartheid. London: Verso, 2001.
- Chomsky, Noam. Fateful Triangle: The United States, Israel, and the Palestinians. Rev. edn. Cambridge, MA: South End Press, 1999.
- and Gilbert Achcar. Perilous Power: The Middle East and U.S. Foreign Policy. Boulder, CO: Paradigm Publishers, 2007.
- Churchill, Randolph S., and Winston S. Churchill. The Six Day War. London: Heinemann, 1967.
- Cleveland, William L. A History of the Modern Middle East. 3rd edn. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 2004.
- David, Ron. Arabs & Israel For Beginners. New York: Writers and Readers Publishing, Inc., 1996.
- Elon, Amos. The Israelis: Founders and Sons. 1971. Reprint, New York: Penguin Books, 1983.
- Enderlin, Charles. Shattered Dreams: The Failure of the Peace Process in the Middle East, 1995–2002. Trans. Susan Fairfield. New York: Other Press, 2003.
- Farsoun, Samih K., and Christina E. Zacharia. Palestine and the Palestinians. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1997.
- Finkelstein, Norman G. Image and Reality of the Israel–Palestine Conflict. 2nd edn. London: Verso, 2003.
- Fisk, Robert. Pity the Nation: The Abduction of Lebanon. 4th edn. New York: Thunder's Mouth Press/Nation Books, 2002.
- Flapan, Simha. The Birth of Israel: Myths and Realities. New York: Pantheon Books, 1987.
- Fraser, T. G. The Middle East, 1914–1979. New York: St Martin's Press, 1980.
- The Arab–Israeli Conflict. 2nd edn. New York: Palgrave Macmillan, 2004.
- Fromkin, David. A Peace to End All Peace. New York: Henry Holt and Company, 1989.
- Glubb, Sir John Bagot. A Soldier with the Arabs. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1957.
- Goldschmidt, Arthur Jr., and Lawrence Davidson. A Concise History of the Middle East. 9th edn. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 2009.
- Green, Stephen. Taking Sides: America's Secret Relations with a Militant Israel. New York: William Morrow and Company, Inc., 1984.
- Greer, Thomas H., and Gavin Lewis. A Brief History of the Western World. 9th edn. Belmont, CA: Thomson Wadsworth, 2005.
- Guyatt, Nicholas. The Absence of Peace: Understanding the Israeli–Palestinian Conflict. London: Zed Books, 1998.
- Hayes, J. R., ed. The Genius of Arab Civilization: Source of Renaissance. 2nd edn. Cambridge, MA: MIT Press, 1983.
- Herzl, Theodor. The Jewish State. 1946. Reprint, New York: Dover Publications, Inc., 1988.
- Hitti, Philip K. The Arabs: A Short History. 1943. Reprint, Washington, DC: Regnery Publishing, Inc., 1996.
- History of the Arabs. 10th edn. London: Macmillan & Co. Ltd, 1970.
- Hourani, Albert. A History of the Arab Peoples. New York: Warner Books, 1991.
- Ingrams, Doreen. Palestine Papers, 1917–1922: Seeds of Conflict. New York: George Braziller, 1973.
- Khalidi, Rashid. Palestinian Identity: The Construction of Modern National Consciousness. New York: Columbia University Press, 1997.
- Khouri, Fred J. The Arab–Israeli Dilemma. 3rd edn. Syracuse, NY: Syracuse University Press, 1985.
- Kimmerling, Baruch, and Joel S. Migdal. The Palestinian People: A History. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2003.
- Lamb, David. The Arabs: Journeys Beyond the Mirage. Rev. edn. New York: Vintage Books, 2002.
- Laqueur, Walter, and Barry Rubin, eds. The Israel–Arab Reader. 7th edn. New York: Penguin Books, 2008.
- Mandel, Neville J. The Arabs and Zionism Before World War I. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1976.
- Mansfield, Peter. The Arabs. 3rd edn. London: Penguin Books, 1992.
- Masalha, Nur. Expulsion of the Palestinians: The Concept of "Transfer" in Zionist Political Thought, 1882–1948. Washington, DC: Institute for Palestinian Studies, 1992.
- McCarthy, Justin. The Population of Palestine: Population Statistics of the Late Ottoman Period and the Mandate. New York: Columbia University Press, 1990.

- Morris, Benny. The Birth of the Palestinian Refugee Problem Revisited. 2nd edn. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2004.
- Righteous Victims: A History of the Zionist-Arab Conflict, 1881–2001. New York: Vintage Books, 2001.
- Neff, Donald. Warriors for Jerusalem: The Six Days That Changed the Middle East. New York: Linden Press/Simon & Schuster, 1984.
- Pappé, Ilan, ed. The Israel/Palestine Question. London: Routledge, 2002.
- Peretz, Don. Intifada: The Palestinian Uprising. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 1990.
- Quandt, William B. Peace Process: American Diplomacy and the Arab–Israeli Conflict Since 1967. 3rd edn. Washington, DC: Brookings Institution, 2005.
- Reinhart, Tanya. Israel/Palestine: How to End the War of 1948. 2nd edn. New York: Seven Stories, 2005.
- The Road Map to Nowhere: Israel/Palestine Since 2003. London: Verso, 2006.
- Rodinson, Maxime. Muhammad. Trans. Anne Carter. 1971. Reprint, New York: The New Press, 2002.
- Rogan, Eugene L., and Avi Shlaim, eds. The War for Palestine: Rewriting the History of 1948. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2001.
- Rokach, Livia. Israel's Sacred Terrorism. 3rd edn. Belmont, MA: AAUG Press, 1986.
- Sachar, Howard M. A History of Israel: From the Rise of Zionism to Our Time. 3rd edn. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 2007.
- Safran, Nadav. Israel: The Embattled Ally. Cambridge, MA: The Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1978.
- Said, Edward W. The Question of Palestine. 1979. Reprint, New York: Vintage Books, 1992.
- and Christopher Hitchens, eds. Blaming the Victims. London: Verso, 1988.
- Schiff, Ze'ev, and Ehud Ya'ari. Israel's Lebanon War. Ed. and trans. Ina Friedman. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1984.
- Segev, Tom. One Palestine, Complete: Jews and Arabs Under the British Mandate. Trans. Haim Watzman. New York: Henry Holt and Company, 2000.
- Shipler, David K. Arab and Jew: Wounded Spirits in a Promised Land. Rev. edn. New York: Penguin Books, 2002.
- Shlaim, Avi. Collusion Across the Jordan: King Abdullah, the Zionist Movement, and the Partition of Palestine. New York: Columbia University Press, 1988.
- War and Peace in the Middle East. New York: Penguin Books, 1995.
- The Iron Wall: Israel and the Arab World. New York: W.W. Norton, 1999.
- Smith, Charles D. Palestine and the Arab–Israeli Conflict. 7th edn. Boston: Bedford/St Martin's, 2010.
- Smith, Huston. The World's Religions: Our Great Wisdom Traditions. 1958. Reprint, San Francisco: HarperCollins, 1991.
- Swisher, Clayton. The Truth About Camp David: The Untold Story About the Collapse of the Middle East Peace Process. New York: Nation Books, 2004.
- Sykes, Christopher. Crossroads to Israel. Cleveland: The World Publishing Company, 1965.
- Tessler, Mark. A History of the Israeli–Palestinian Conflict. 2nd edn. Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press, 2009.
- Thomas, Baylis. How Israel Was Won: A Concise History of the Arab–Israeli Conflict. Lanham, MD: Lexington Books, 1999.
- Usher, Graham. Palestine in Crisis: The Struggle for Peace and Political Independence After Oslo. London: Pluto Press, 1995.
- Vital, David. The Origins of Zionism. 1975. Reprint, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Watt, W. Montgomery. Muhammad: Prophet and Statesman. London: Oxford University Press, 1961.

Index

- Abbas, Mahmoud 179, 182, 191, 192, 197, 203
 - and Hamas 199
- Abbasid Dynasty 33, 35, 40
- Abdullah, King (Jordan) 96, 97, 98, 103
- Abdullah II, King (Jordan) 179
- Abdullah, King (Saudi Arabia) 179
- Abraham (biblical patriarch) 3, 7, 27, 30, 31, 77
- Abu-Bakr 32, 33
- AbuDis 166, 171
- Abu-Talib 27, 29
- Achille Lauro* 140
- Aelia Capitolina 19
- Agha, Hussein 166
- Al-Aqsa Intifada see Intifada, Second
- Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigade 172
- Al-Aqsa Mosque 77, 159, 206
- al-Assad, Bashar 188
- Albright, Madeleine 161, 162–3
- Albright, William F. 6, 10
- Alexander the Great 16
 - see also* Hellenism; Seleucid Empire
- Alexander II, Czar 49–50
- Alexandria Protocol 83
- Aliya see Jewish immigration to Palestine
- Allon, Yigal 211
- Ammonites 10, 12, 15
- Amorites 6, 7, 23
- Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry (AAC) 89
- Annan, Kofi 181, 186
- Annapolis Conference 193
- Anti-Semitism 48 (box), 50, 52, 54, 71
- Aqaba Summit (2003) 179
- Arab Empire see Abbasid Dynasty; Rashidun Caliphate; Umayyad Dynasty
- Arab independence 67, 71
- Arab League 83, 179–80, 192, 201–2
- Arab Revolt (1936-39) 78–80, 93
- Arab Spring 198–9
- Arab State 79, 80, 89–90, 92, 109
- Arab-Israeli conflict 103–7
 - definition 87, 95, 102
 - US diplomacy 115, 127, 129, 150
 - War of Attrition (1968-70) 120–2
- Arabian Peninsula 23–6, 65
- Arabs
 - ancient 14, 20
 - origins 23–4
 - Pre-Islamic culture 23–7
 - Pre-Islamic religion 26
- Arafat, Yasser
 - Camp David II 166–7

- Chairman of PLO 119, 128
- death 181–2
- diplomatic efforts 130, 132, 139
- Fatah 108, 139
- Geneva Accord 181
- Intifada 149
- Lebanon 136, 138–9
- Oslo 152, 154, 155, 157–61
- Palestinian statehood 147
- Second Intifada 170, 171, 172
- support for Saddam 149
- Aramaeans 7, 12, 14
- Argov, Shlomo 135
- Ashkenazi Jews 60–1
- Ashrawi, Hanan 151
- Assyrian Empire 13–14
- Aswan Dam 106, 107
- Ayalon, Ami, Ayalon-Nusseibeh Plan 180
- Ayyash, Yahya 158

- Baghdad Pact 104
- Baker, James 150–2
- Balfour, Arthur 69, 74
- Balfour Declaration 69–72, 75, 76, 80, 115
- Barak, Ehud 161–3, 166–7, 170, 171
- Bedouin 24–6
- Begin, Menachem 127–30, 132–6, 138, 139, 143
- Beilin, Yossi, Geneva Accord 180
- Ben-Gurion, David 82, 94, 95 (quote), 96–8, 101 (quote), 105
- Bethlehem 38, 92 (map), 155, 156 (map), 164 (map)
- Bible 3–4, 6–8, 9, 10, 12
- Bickerton, Ian J. 155
 - see also* Klausner, Carla L.
- Biden, Joseph 197
- Big Pines, Little Pines 134–6
 - see also* Lebanon, Invasion of
- Biltmore Conference 82
- BILU 52
- Black September 120
- Blair, Tony 178
- Blue Line (Lebanon border) 188
- Brezhnev Plan 138, 139
- Britain
 - Baghdad pact 104
 - Mandate 72, 75, 77–81, 89–91, 97, 118
 - Suez Crisis (1956) 106–7
 - World War I 65–76
 - World War II 81–2
- Bronze Age
 - Early 5–6
 - Late 8–9, 10
 - Middle 5–8
- B'Tselem 174, 188, 194, 212
- Bush, George H.W. 150–2
- Bush, George W. 170–1, 177–8, 182, 192
- Byzantine Empire 20–1, 33–6, 40–1

- Cairo Agreement (1970) 120
- Caliphate 33, 39
- Camel 24

Camp David Accords (1978) 126, 128, 148
Camp David II (2000) 162–7
Canaan
 Egyptian rule 8–10
 geography 4 kingdoms 12 (box), 13
 name 4
 see also Ammonites; Aramaeans; Edomites; Moabites; Philistines; Phoenicians
Carter, Jimmy 127–9, 131, 181, 192–3, 207
Chalcolithic 5
Christianity birth of 18, 19–20
 Islam 31
 millet system 41–2
Chronology 4–5
Churchill, Winston 75
Clinton, Hillary 197
Clinton Plan (2000) 171
Clinton, William Jefferson 151–2, 160, 161, 162–3, 165–7, 170, 181
Cold War 88, 102, 104, 108, 150
Committee of Union and Progress, (CUP) 42–3
Conference 193–4
Constantinople 20, 26, 36–7, 40–1, 56, 66
Constantinople Agreement (March 1915) 66, 68
Convergence Plan 211
Crane, Charles see King-Crane Commission
Crusades 35, 36–8, 40

Dayan, Moshe 124, 126, 128
Deir Yassin 94, 101
Demography 210
Demolition of houses 146, 172, 205
Disengagement Plan 182–4
Dome of the Rock 77, 159
Dreyfus Affair 53–4
Dugard, John 191
Dulles, John Foster 106
Durra, Muhammad al- 169

Edomites 8–9, 10, 12, 15
Egypt
 ancient history 6–9, 13, 16
 Arab-Israeli conflict 117–18 diplomacy 128–30, 148, 150
 Gaza 98
 Hamas 194
 Islamic history 33–4, 37–40
 PLO 120
 Russia 106, 121, 123–6
 Suez Crisis (1956) 106–7
 War (1948) 92–3, 95–7, 99, 103–7
 War (1967) 108–13
 War (1973) 122–6
 War of Attrition (1969) 121–2
 World War I 66, 70
 World War II 82
Erekat, Saeb 202
European Union, Hamas 186

Fatah, al- 108, 118, 119, 139, 185

- and Hamas 186, 191–2, 199
- Fayyad, Salam 192
- Fez Plan 138
- Flotilla, Freedom 214
- France
 - Israel 108
 - Jews 48, 54
 - Suez Crisis (1956) 106–7
 - UN 97
 - World War I 66–9, 72–3
 - World War II 81
- Free Gaza Movement 214
- Friedman, Thomas 179

- Gaza
 - Arab Spring 198–9
 - blockade 192, 193–5, 205, 211–14
 - demography 210, 212
 - economic and environmental crisis 212–14
 - Egypt 98–9, 118, 121
 - Hamas and 190–2
 - Intifada 141–3, 145–6
 - Israel and 110–11, 117, 127, 129, 131, 140, 213–14
 - Israeli raids 105, 184, 203–4
 - Israeli withdrawals 107, 153–4, 182–4, 196
 - Operation Cast Lead (2008) 194–6, 212
 - Operation Pillar of Defense (2012) 199–201, 212
 - Operation Protective Edge (2014) 204–5, 212
 - Operation Summer Rains (2006) 187–8
 - post-Lebanon civil war 138
 - settlements 143, 159
 - sewage crisis 212–13
 - statehood 151, 154, 162
 - Gemayel, Bashir 134, 135–7
 - Geneva Accords (2003) 180–1, 208
 - Geneva Conventions 128, 148
 - George, David Lloyd 70
 - Germany 66, 72, 81
 - Ghazis 40
 - Ging, John 213
 - Gisha (Israeli human rights organization) 190–1, 213–14
 - Glubb, Sir John Bagot 97, 98
 - Golan Heights 111, 114 (map), 124, 125, 129, 159, 162
 - Goldschmidt, Arthur, Jr. 67, 115
 - Gorbachev, Mikhail 181
 - Gore, Al 170
 - Green Line 1, 99, 112, 154
 - as basis for Palestinian state 163, 181, 201, 208
 - Wall and 174–5
 - Gulf Crisis see Iraq

- Habib, Philip 134, 136
- Haganah 93–4
- Haig, Alexander 131, 135
- Hajj, Pilgrimage to Mecca 27, 29, 32
- Hamas (Islamic Resistance Movement) 145–6, 159, 161, 172, 184–6, 187–8, 200
 - and Fatah 186, 191–2, 199
 - and Operation Cast Lead 194–5
- Haniyeh, Ismail 192
- Hapiru 8, 11

Har Homa 160–1
Haram al-Sharif 76–7, 161, 168–9
 see also Jerusalem Temple; Temple Mount Hashemite Clan 27, 98
Hasmonean Kingdom 17–18
Hebron 77, 92 (map), 155, 160, 164 (map)
Hebron Agreement (1997) 160–1
Hellenism 16–17
Herod, the Great 18
Hersh, Seymour 190
Herzl, Theodor 47, 53–6, 101 (quote)
Hibbat Zion 52, 54
Hijrah 29
Hitler, Adolf 81
Hizballah 158–9, 188–90
Holocaust 81, 82
Hope-Simpson, John see
 Hope-Simpson Commission
Hope-Simpson Commission 78
Hudaybiya, Treaty 32
Human Rights Watch, World Report 2007 177
Hussein, Agha 166
Hussein, King 109, 110, 120, 126, 138
Hussein, Saddam 149, 178
Hussein, Sharif 67–8, 70, 71, 72
Hussein-McMahon Correspondence 67–8, 72, 115
Hyksos 6–8

International Court of Justice (ICJ) 175
International Red Cross 189
Intifada, First (1987-91) 141–50, 152
Intifada, Second (2000-03) 168–71, 172
Iran 190, 200
Iraq
 Gulf Crisis 149–50
 Islamic empire 34, 35, 39–40
 Mandate 73–5
 Operation Iraqi Freedom 178
 Ottoman empire 41
 War (1948) 93, 95–6, 98, 103, 104
 War (1967) 108, 110
 World War I 66, 71
Irgun 82, 93–4, 127
Iron Age, Early 9–10
Isaac (biblical patriarch) 3, 7, 77
Islam 27 (box), 31
Islamic empire see Abbasid; Iraq; Rashidun Caliphate; Umayyad Dynasty
Islamic Jihad 145, 158, 172
Israel, Land of (Eretz-Israel) 47, 52, 57, 127
Israel, Northern Kingdom 13–14
Israel, State 108, 109, 117, 121–3, 126–7, 129, 130, 131
 Egypt 128–30
 Gaza 213–14
 Hamas 185
 Intifada 141, 143, 146–7
 Iraqi (Scud) missile attacks 150
 Lebanon 132–8
 PLO 153–4
 South Lebanon 133–7, 160, 189
 statehood 93, 94–5

- see also* Jewish state
- Suez Crisis (1956) 106–7
- Syria 151, 162
- Tunis 140
- War (1967) 110–11
- War (1973) 124–6
- War of Attrition (1969) 120
- Israel Stele 9
- Israel, United Kingdom 10–11
- Israeli Air Force (IAF) 189, 195, 199–200, 204
- Israeli Defense Force (IDF) 95–6
 - and Egypt 121, 125
 - First Intifada 141–3
 - Hasmonean tunnel 160
 - Lebanon 136–8, 158–9
 - Operation Summer Rains 187–8, 189–90
 - and Second Intifada 169
 - Six-Day War 110
 - see also* Haganah
- Israelites
 - Canaanites and Israelites 12, 21
 - origins 8–11
 - see also* Jews
- J Street (Jewish advocacy group) 202–3
- Jabal Abu Ghneim see Har Homa
- Jabari, Ahmed al- 200
- Jabotinsky, Vladimir 63, 82
- Jacob (biblical patriarch) 7
- Jarring, Gunnar 113, 121–2
- Jenin 92 (map), 155, 156 (map), 164 (map), 174
- Jerusalem
 - Assyrians and Neo-Babylonians 14
 - Crusades 36–7, 38
 - hellenized 19
 - international entity 90
 - Israel 110
 - Mamluks 40
 - Mandate 77
 - Palestinian capital 162, 163, 165
 - religious sites 206
 - Romans 18–19
 - settlements 160
- Jerusalem Temple
 - biblical history 14, 15, 17
 - destruction 18–19
 - Hasmonean tunnel 159–60
 - Western Wall (Wailing Wall) 19, 76–7
 - see also* Haram al-Sharif; Temple Mount
- Jesus of Nazareth 18
- Jewish immigration to Palestine
 - aliya 53, 61–2
 - suspended 78
 - white papers 80, 88
- Jewish State 55, 80, 92 (map), 100–1
 - Balfour Declaration 74, 76
 - Palestinian refugees 100–1
 - Partition 89–90
 - Peel Commission 79
 - see also* Israel

Jewish-Arab conflict early conflict 63
 Mandate 77, 79–80
 misconceptions 3, 21, 31
 War (1948) 95
 see also Arab-Israeli conflict

Jews
 Byzantines 20
 diaspora 19, 47
 Europe 48
 Hasmoneans 17
 Medina 30–2
 millet system 41–2 minority population 210 name 15
 origins 21
 Ottomans 60–1
 Persians 15–16
 Roman 17–19
 Rome 17–19
 Russian 49–53, 60–1, 63
 Seleucids 16–17

Johnson, Lyndon B. 108, 111

Jordan 98–9, 109, 120
 British Mandate 75, 79
 diplomacy 129, 131, 138
 Palestine (annexation) 97–8
 PLO 118, 120, 139
 War (1948) 103
 War (1967) 109–10
 War (1973) 122, 126

Joseph (biblical patriarch) 7

Judaea 15–19

Judah, Kingdom of 13–15 see also Israel, Kingdom of

Judas Maccabeus 17
 see also Hasmonean Kingdom

Ka'bah 30 (box)

Kadima Party 185

Karameh 118
 see also Fatah, al-

Kerry, John 201–3, 208–9

Khadija 28–9

Khan, Genghis 39

Khartoum Summit (1967) 113

King, Henry see King-Crane Commission

King-Crane Commission 73–4

Kissinger, Henry 123, 124, 125–6, 127

Klausner, Carla L. 155
 see also Bickerton, Ian J.

Kochavi, Brigadier General Aviv 184

Kuwait 148–9, 150

Labor Party 127, 139

Laden, Osama bin 173

Land-for-peace 112–13, 126, 151, 179

Lavon Affair 104–5

Lawrence, T. E. (“Lawrence of Arabia”) 71

League of Nations 72, 75

see also United Nations
Lebanese National Movement (LNM) 132, 133
Lebanon 120, 131–9
 British Mandate 75 civil war 132–8 invasion of (1982) 131–8
 PLO 120, 131–8
 South Lebanon 158, 188, 189–90
 War (1948) 95–6, 103
LEHI 82, 93–4
Liberty, USS 111
Libya 198
Likud Party 127, 139, 143, 157, 159, 185
Livni, Tzipi 202

Ma'ale Adumim settlement 211
MacDonald, Ramsay 78
McMahon, Sir Henry 67
Madrid Conference 150–2, 193
Malley, Robert 166
Mamluks 40, 64
Mandate System 72–3, 75 see also Palestine
Mandel, Neville J. 58, 62
Mandela, Nelson 181
Maronite Christians 131–7
Marshall Plan 88
Mavi Marmara 214
Mecca 27, 77
 see also Hajj
Mecca Accord 191
Medina 29–32, 77
Meir, Golda 122, 124, 126
Merneptah, Pharaoh 9
Meshaal, Khaled 188
Millet system 41–2
Mitchell Committee (and Report) 177
Mitchell, George 196, 197
Moabites 10, 12
Mongols 39–40
Morris, Benny 100
Morrison-Grady Committee 89
Moses, the Prophet, 9, 27 (box) 31
Mossad 108
Muamar (Osama and Mustafa Abu) 187
Mubarak, Hosni 132
Muhammad, the Prophet
 death 32
 Haram al-Sharif 77
 Mecca 29
 Medina 29–30 revelation 28–9 youth 27
Muslim Brotherhood 145

Nablus 58, 92 (map), 155, 156 (map), 164 (map), 174
Naqba, al- see War (1948)
Nasrallah, Hasan 189
Nasser, Gamal Abdul 103, 104–7, 108, 109–10, 118, 120–2
Neo-Babylonian Empire 14–15

Neolithic 5
Netanyahu, Benjamin 159–61, 196, 200, 203 and peace negotiations 197–8, 201–2, 207–8, 213
Nidal, Abu 135
Nixon, Richard 121, 123, 127
Nusseibeh, Sari, Ayalon-Nusseibeh Plan 180

Obama, Barack 194, 195–7, 199, 200–1, 207–8
Olmert, Ehud 175, 177, 185, 187, 211
Operations
 Badr 124
 Cast Lead 194–6, 212
 Defensive Shield 173–4
 Desert Storm 149
 Grapes of Wrath 158
 Iraqi Freedom 178
 Litani 134
 Peace for Galilee 135
 Pillar of Defense 199–201, 212
 Protective Edge 204–5, 212
 Summer Rains 187–8
Oslo Accord (1993) 150, 152–4
Oslo II (Taba Accord) 154, 156
 (map), 157–8, 160–1
Osman I 40–1
Ottoman Empire
 founding 40–3
 World War I 58–9, 63, 65–7
Ottoman Land Code (1858) 59–60

Pale of Settlement 49–51
 see also Jews
Paleolithic 5
Palestine
 Arab population 59–60, 62–3, 76, 80, 130 claims to land 3, 21–2 committee findings 79, 89 fragmentation 205–6
 geography 4, 57–8
 Jewish population 78, 80, 89
 Mandate 72, 75–83, 87–9
 name 4, 19, 57–8
 partition 89–91, 92 (map), 93, 96
 UN recognition 199, 201
 World War I 75–6
Palestinian Authority (PA) 157, 178–9, 182
 Camp David II 162–3, 165–7
 and Hamas 203
 Israel and 160, 162, 170, 185
 and UN 198, 199
Palestinian State 132, 138, 151, 153–4, 157, 162, 163 and two-state solution 171, 177, 179–80, 181–3, 202, 210–11 Palestinians
 demography 210
 identity 205–6 leadership 93, 206 nationalism 117, 118
 origins 21
 refugees 94, 99–101, 111–12, 117, 131, 165, 180–1, 211
Passfield White Paper 78

Patriarchs see Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph
Peace process
 from 2002 179–81
 (1991–2001) 168
 ”convergence” 211
 Resolution (242) 151
Peel Commission 79, 80
People’s Voice (Nusseibeh-Ayalon) 180, 208
Peres, Shimon 139, 154, 155, 157, 158, 159
Persian Empire 15–16
Phalange 13, 134
Philistines 10–11, 12, 14
Phoenicians 10, 12
Picot, François George see Sykes-Picot Agreement
Pinsker, Leo 52
PLO (Palestine Liberation Organization) 151, 153–4 attack on Tel Aviv 148
 diplomacy 128, 130–1, 147–8
 formation 108
 Intifada 142, 145
 Jordan 120
 Lebanon 120, 131–9
 peace talks 152–3
 PNC charter 117–19
 Saddam Hussein 149
 Tunis 139–40
PNC (Palestinian National Council) charter 118–19 declaration of Palestine statehood 147
Poetry, Arab 25
Popular Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PDFLP) 119
Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP) 119–20
Putin, Vladimir 170

Qaddafi, Muammar 198
Qaida, Al- 173
Qiblah 31
Quandt, William 166, 167
Quartet 178, 186, 191
Quran 30 (box)
Qurayzah clan, see also Jews
Qurei, Ahmed 179

Rabat Declaration 130
Rabbo, Yasser Abed 180
Rabin, Yitzhak 126, 151, 154, 157, 161
Ramadan 27 (box), 31
Ramallah 92 (map), 155, 156 (map), 164 (map), 173, 181
Rashidun Caliphate 33
Reagan Plan 138
Refugees see Palestinians
Resolution (43/21) 146
Resolution (194) 165
Resolution (242)
 text 115–16 (box)
 peace process 151, 178
 PLO 128, 147, 149
 Rogers Plan 121
 UN 112–14
Resolution (338) 125, 147, 151, 178
Resolution (425) 134

Resolution (1322) 169
Resolution (2334) 207–9
Resolution (3236) 130–1
Resolution (3237) 130–1
Resolution (3379) 131
Road Map 178–9, 186
Rogers Plan 121
Roman Empire 17–20
Rose Garden address (Bush 2002) 177–8
Ross, Dennis 161, 207
Roy, Sara 212
Russia
 diplomacy 138, 151
 Egypt 106, 121, 123–6
 invasion of Turkey 42 recognition of Israel 95
 Revolution 70
 War (1967) 109
 World War I 66
 World War II 87–8
 see also Cold War
Russian Jews 49–53, 60–1, 63

Saar, Gideon 183
Sabra and Shatila massacre 137, 139
Sadat, Anwar 122–4, 126–8, 132
Samu, Village of 109
San Remo Conference 75
Sasanids (Persians) 26
Saudi Arabia
 Arab-Israeli conflict 102
 diplomacy 126, 139
Saudi Plan (2002, 2007) 179–80, 191, 192, 208
Seleucid Empire 16–17
Seljuk Dynasty 35
Semitic 7 (box)
Sephardic Jews 60–1
September 11, 2001 attacks 173
Settlement of occupied territories connections between 158, 163, 165
 East Jerusalem 160, 202, 205, 211
 Gaza 143, 159, 183
 general 127–8, 131, 132, 143, 153, 160–1, 202, 207
 Hebron 160
 illegality 160, 177, 197, 198, 207–8 moratorium (freeze) 138, 159, 177, 179, 183, 197
 West Bank 153, 159, 161, 163, 164 (map), 197, 201 see also Wall
Shalit, Gilad 187, 188
Shamir, Yitzhak 139, 151, 152
Sharett, Moshe 105–6
Sharm al-Sheik
 Memorandum (1999) 161–2
 Summit (2000) 170, 177
Sharon, Ariel 107, 132, 134–7, 168–9, 172, 181
 Gaza 182–3
 stroke and coma 184–5
Shasu 8–9, 12 (box)
 see also Edomites
Shaw Report (Sir Walter Shaw) 77, 78

Shlaim, Avi 123, 151, 153
Sinai Accords (1974) 126
Sinai, Mount 8–9
Sinai Peninsula
 Camp David 129
 Israel 106, 107, 121–3, 126–7, 130
Six-Day War see War (1967)
Smith, Charles D. 88, 103, 144, 154
South Lebanese Army (SLA) 133
Stern Gang see LEHI
Stone Age see Chalcolithic; Neolithic; Paleolithic
Suez Canal 66, 70
 Camp David 129
 nationalized 104–6
 War of Attrition (1969) 120
Suez Crisis (1956) 106–7
Suicide Bombing see Terrorism
Sumud 143–4
Sykes-Picot Agreement (Sir Mark Sykes) 68, 71–2
Syria
 ancient 17, 18
 French Mandate 75
 Greater Syria 73, 74
 Lebanon 133, 136, 139
 Ottoman empire 67–8
 PLO 120
 relations with Israel 109, 162
 War (1948) 93, 95–6, 103
 War (1967) 109–11
 War (1973) 124–5

Taba Accord (Oslo II) 154, 156 (map), 157–8, 160–1
Taba Statement (2001) 171
Tanzim 172
Tanzimat 42, 59
Tel Aviv 57, 92 (map), 114 (map), 148, 149, 157, 161, 164 (map)
Temple Mount 76, 159, 168–9 see also Haram al-Sharif; Jerusalem Temple
Tenet, George 161
Terrorism 93–4, 137, 157, 161 kidnappings 203
 “lone wolf” attacks 205–6
 PLO factions 119, 130, 140, 147 suicide bombings 161, 172–3
Thant, U 110
34-Day War see War (2006)
Tiran, Straits of 106, 110, 114 (map)
Transjordan see Jordan
Trilateral Commission 202
Truman, Harry S. 88, 91
Trump, Donald 206–7, 208
Tunis 139–40
Tunisia 198

Uganda Offer 56
Ukaz, Fair of 25–6
Umayyad Dynasty 33
UNESCO 199
Unified National Leadership of the Uprising (UNLU) 145
United Nations

- diplomacy 130–1, 138–9, 146, 147, 160
- First Intifada 147
- organization 96–7
- partition of Palestine 89–93, 99
- recognition of Palestine 199, 201
- refugees 165
- resolutions (general) 97, 131, 160, 174, 175
- Second Intifada 169
- Suez Crisis (1956) 107
- War (1948) 95–6
- War (1967) 108–11
- War (1973) 122, 125–6
- see also* Quartet; Resolution(s)
- United Nations Emergency Forces (UNEF) 107, 109, 110
- United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon (UNIFIL) 136
- United Nations Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs (OCHA) 204
- United Nations Relief and Works Agency (UNRWA) 165
- United Nations Special Committee on Palestine (UNSCOP) 90–1
- United States 66, 69, 87
 - Egypt 106, 126
 - Gulf Crisis 148–9
 - Hamas 185–6, 191–2, 193–4
 - Hizballah 190
 - Iran 190, 200
 - Israel (recognition) 95
 - Israel (relations) 108, 124–5, 207–8
 - Lebanon 134, 136–7
 - Middle East diplomacy 121–4, 128, 135, 150, 159
 - Palestine-Israel diplomacy 128–9, 147, 150–1, 152, 154, 160–3, 165–6
 - PLO 120, 139–40, 147–8, 151
 - Second Intifada 170–1
 - UN 207–8
 - War (1973) 122–6
 - War of Attrition (1969) 121–2
- Wall (Israeli security fence) 174–5, 176 (map), 177, 202, 211
- War (1948)
 - 1949 armistice 98–9
 - Arab countries 93, 95–6
 - first phase 91–5
 - second phase 95–8
- War (1967: Six-Day War) 108–13
 - invasion of Syria 110–11
 - Israeli occupied territory 114 (map)
 - leading up to 108
 - peace agreements 112–16
 - UNEF withdrawal 109
- War (1973: Yom Kippur War) 122–6
- War (2006: 34-Day War) 188–90
- War of Attrition (1969) 120–2
- “War on terror” 173
- Weisglass, Dov 183, 185
- Weizmann, Chaim 70, 75, 78
- West Bank 198–9
 - Camp David 129
 - Camp David II 162–6
 - demography 210
 - Israel 110, 127
 - Israeli withdrawal 153–5, 157, 160
 - post-Lebanon 138

security fence (wall) 174–5, 176 (map), 177, 202, 211 settlement encroachment 211 stagnation 205
statehood 164–6, 167 (map)
Western Wall see Jerusalem Temple
White Papers
 (1922) 75, 80
 (1939) 80, 81–2, 88
Wilson, Woodrow 70, 72, 73
Woodhead Commission 80
World Factbook (CIA) 210
World War I 65–72
World War II 81–3, 87
World Zionist Organization 55, 56, 82
Wye River Accord (1998) 161

Yahweh, God 8–9
Yassin, Sheik Ahmad 185
Yathrib see Medina
Yishuv 60–1
Yom Kippur War see War (1973)
Young Ottomans 42
Young Turks 42–3, 63

Zionism 51–3, 51 (box), 54, 69, 76, 77, 82
Zionists 52–7, 62–3, 69–70, 75, 78, 79, 91, 93, 94, 96, 101, 145